HELEN MOIR OR LOVE AND HONOUR.

CHAPTER XXVIII.

"The second—the last, unmitigated scoundrel!" said Bridgenorth, through his ground teeth, his eyes at the same time flaming with rage, and his bosom panting with wrath.

"Oh," he went on, "what an idiot I was to be so easily duped and led into this trap! I scorn and loathe myself at the thought of it."

"Alas, father!" moaned Helen, "how could we suspect treachery? The bait held out was at once so natural and so alluring."

"Yes," returned her father, with intense bitterness; "their plot was well laid, and, through my stupidity, most easily executed. My child, my child, I have brought you into this danger!"

"No, father, no; reproach not yourself thus," whispered Helen, soothingly. "They have succeeded only because they have trafficked on the holiest feelings of the heart. But oh, father," she wailed, "is there no escape for us? Can Heaven allow such iniquity to prosper?"

"Never!" shouted Bridgenorth, with vehemence. "Never, else Heaven has formed a league with hell, and right and justice have fled from the universe. I cannot, will not believe that such monstrous outrages can prevail."

"And yet, father," sighed Helen, "things as wicked have been done in the world, and Heaven did not interfere to prevent."

He sprang up and clutched his hands in fury.

"What!" he cried, "you forced to become the wife of that wretch—his—his—wife!"

"No, father," answered Helen, very gently, and with deadly paleness, "that shall never be. Death and the grave rather than that. But, oh, it is hard, to have the cup of happiness again dashed from my lips when it had returned there, and Hermann and I were free to drink of it. Dear, dear Hermann, shall we never meet again?"

And with a great burst of grief, she sank on the floor, laid her head on the cushioned seat of the chair, and sobbed and wept with convulsive vehemence.

Wildly her father flew to her, gathered her in his arms, and sought to soothe and comfort her. But what words could he utter which could have the desired effect? He was powerless to help—powerless to save her. Gladly would he have sacrificed himself for her deliverance; but he had not the means of doing even that. It maddened him to see her grief, and he impetuously to mitigate it. An outraged wild beast of the jungle had not more ferociousness than he had at the moment; and, could he have got Jaquin or Duboisque into his hands then, he would, in his frenzied fury, have torn them to pieces.

But shut up in that narrow cabin, with every outlet sealed he could do nothing—nothing, only clench his teeth till they were nearly broke, and curse with awful rage the fiends who had incarcerated them.

The day advanced, and slowly its hours one by one passed away, the vessel all the while sailing rapidly along before a steady breeze. Sometimes from the little circular windows of the cabin they saw the shore at a great distance, though often it was undistinguishable. Frequently, too, they saw vessels sailing near, and manoeuvred in every visible and decent of despair their inability to communicate their situation and solicit aid.

Thus the evening drew on, and night again fell. In the most trying circumstances nature claims her due; it is not perhaps very wonderful, then; that both slept, and that soundly. Helen was the first to sink into the blissful region of forgetfulness, and it was a relief to her father's heart when he found that the soft and silent mantle of a peaceful slumber had fallen on her soul. He was thankful of it, inasmuch as it gave her a respite from the grief and terror of her heart, and stole away for a brief time the anguish of her fear. In calm and pure beauty she lay, with her head resting on the curtain, and her pale and lovely face dimly discernible through the darkness, for no lamp had been placed that night in the cabin.

We have heard recently of several severe cases of spinal disease cured by Johnston's Anodyne Liniment: one case of a man forty-five years old, who had not done a day's work for four years. The back should first be washed, then rubbed with a coarse towel. Apply the Liniment cold, and rub in well with the hand.

The last winter, in England, has been the mildest on record. During the whole time, the thermometer fell below the freezing point only four times—on the night of January 15th and 16th and March 10th and 11th.
