Lord Wolseley begins to cut a sorry sight as a general. He has been made too much of. He was honored and preferred beyond his deserts. He was looked upon as the hope of the army before he had shown any great generalship. Generalship does not consist in writing fine despatches, nor in conducting a petty, campaign. In his first real test, that of the present war in Egypt, he has, so far, signally failed: he may be able to blame others, but we hold that cace he took command, the praise or the blame must fall on his own shoulders. At present the British army is divided that of General Sir Frederick Roberts.

Their methods are as far apart as possible, and it begins to look as if the Wolseley school was of the flashy type, Roberts of the solid and lasting kind. It is already understood that Roberts is the man who will take command in the war imminent with Russia. Now that Generals MoNeil and Graham have been censured it will be found that the British public is in no mood to overlook weaknesses, and the first thing that one may expect is a reaction in the case of Lord Wolseley.

"And why not work for a living?" he exclaimed in a determined voice, "Because I happen to be a millionaire's son, brought up without any knowledge of business? But I will work for my living and show my wife that I am not unworthy of the confidence she placed in me," and he steeped and kissed her ser'ly.

It was while pursuing his studies in oil pauting that Harry Marston wooed and won Helen Tracy, a governess in an English family, and an orphan daughter of an officer in the army.

ish family, and an orphan daughter of an officer in the army.

Their new home, consisting of three froms in a house on a dirty sast side street, was very different from the grand old mansion where he had hoped to take his bride, but he set to work cheerfully at his favorite art and tried hard to earn a living by painting portraits. This he found very soon was by no means an easy matter.

At last, one dreary afternoon when Harry was sitting in the dreary little room he called his studio, trying to devise some scheme to replenish his slender purse, the servant unbered in a white-haired old man.

Placing a chair by the fire for his visitor Harry inquired his business.

"You are a portrait painter, I believe, sir?" said the old gentleman, looking at him through his gold-rimmed spectacles?

"That is my profession, sir," said Harry, delighted at the thought of having found a commission at last.

At last, one evening, wearied with a day of fruitiess exertion, he was sitting over the fire watching his wife, who was busy with some dainty needlework, when an idea suddenly flashed upon him.

"Tall, fair, with golden hair and dark blue-syes! Why, Helen, it is the very picture of yourself," he cried, starting to his feet and taking his wife's sweet face between his two hands. Without losing a moment he sat down and commenced to aketan Helen's face, and when his patron called the next morning he was to buslly engaged in putting the finishing touches to the portrait that he did not hear him enter the room, and worked on for some moments unconscious of his presence until with a cry of "Helen, my daughter!" the old man hurried him aside and stood entranced before the picture.

After gazing for some moments in allence only broken by his suppressed sobs, the old man turned to Harry and asked him in an eager voice where he had obtained the original of the picture.

"It is the portrait of my wife," said he.

"Your wife, sir! Who was she? Pardon me for asking the question," he added;
"but I have heard lately that my poor Helen left an orphan daughter, and for a year I have been searching for her, hoping to atone for the wrong I did her mother."

It is needless to add that when the mil-
