CHAPTER II.

Jack Halsey felt in very good humor with himself and with the world in general, as he walked home after this menting. To a third party his little plot for the discomfiture of the pest-master may have seemed crude and even absurd, but Jack himself thought it mightly elever. No small part of his satisfaction over his imaginary correspondence arose from the fact, that his mother would be certain to hor ut the reports about his fletitious courtship, and would be as much deceived as any one else. "The dear old lady," said Jack to himself, "will think her plans for marrying me of have come to something, but won't she be disgusted when she finds out the real truth."

To estimate the full weight of this last remark, the reader should understand that Mrs. Halsey had by no means confined her efforts to change Jack's condition to admonition and advice. For level was a firmed, but as Jack fully believed, for the purpose of entrapping him into matile of house, for company for herself as a faffirmed, but as Jack fully believed, for the purpose of entrapping him into matile of house, for company for herself as a fall understoad beforehand with the best medicine in the worls had been galaded to have a young female companion in the house, for company for herself as a fall in the own of the purpose of entrapping him into matile of his possession of before hand with the best medicine in the condition to admonition and advice. declare that the place was duller than a jail, and make arrangements to replace her by a new importation. As she had plenty of relatives, down to the most remote degrees of cousinship, and an abundance of acquaintances, and as her house was a particularly pleasant one to stay at, there were always agreeable young ladies ready and even anxious to visit her.

It was a wonderful proof of the tenacity with which Jack's mother clung to an idea that after more than ten years of this method of procedure she still continued to follow it. Her earlier young lady companions had become matrons and the mothers of large families and their places had been filled by younger sisters who had been in their cradles when Jack left college. Jack was very a for the marriage.

Jack was very this face straight while all this was heing the postmaster of Cronchville.

CHAPTER III.

Before a week from this time, Miss a lack had taken her departure for her home at Freeport, and in the meatime, all the details of the proposed to the meantime, all the details of the proposed to the meantime, all the details of the proposed to the meantime, all the details of the proposed to the meantime, all the details of the proposed to the meantime, all the details of the proposed to the meantime, all the details of the proposed to the meantime, all the details of the proposed to the meantime, all the details of the proposed to the meantime, all the details of the proposed to the meantime, all the details of the proposed to the meantime, all the details of the proposed sisters who had been in their cradles when Jack left college. Jack was very good friends with some of the young ladies with whom he was thus brought into contact, but none of them had made any impression on his heart. "Hang those sentimental girls that read poetry and look so sweet," Jack used to say. "Give me a girl with some life in her and I'll like her, but I won't marry her."

If a girl with plenty of life in her was what Jack desired, he certainly should do the same in my answers."

For the marriage.

Jack found it very difficult to keep his face straight while all this was being arranged, and on several occasions Lydia had to remind him that the matter in hand was serious and required attention. "Now", that young lady would say in an admonitry fashion, you must not put any nonsense in your letters or old Plummer will smell a rat. You must write lust as if you really loved me and I'll but had broken of your letters.

me a girl with some life in her was what Jack desired, he certainly should have felt bimself well suited in the young lady who was living with his mother at the time his great plot against the post-master was being hatched. Lydia Raker had animal spirits enough for three people and Mrs. Halsey could never complain of being lonely when she was with her. Lydia in fact, at times, proved at most too much for her kind hostess. Her sister Amelia, a sort of third or fourth coust in off. Mrs. Halsey and in each of fourth coust in off. Amelia was a great favorite. Amelia was a vasa agreat favorite. Amelia was a vasa great favorite. Amelia was a vasa great favorite. Amelia was a vasa great favorite and allowed to figure and solut of limb, with black eyes and curly black hart, which was allowed to figure and solut of limb, with black eyes and vertice and hostes of this stamp and so Lydia Backer had been about as the mark or do half a dozen other things to cause the average female to shudder. Lydia always declared that she wisled she had been born a man and every one who know her admitted that nature had make a great mistake in dozen there there to wear petiticoats all her life.

Lydia always declared that she wisled she had been born a man and every one who know her admitted that she wisled she had been born a man and every one who know her admitted that hat she wisled she had been born a man and every one who know her admitted that hat who wisled she had been born a man and every one who know her admitted that hat she wisled she had been born a man and every one who know her admitted that hat he wisled she had been born a man and every one who know her admitted that hat who wisled she had been born a man and every one who know her admitted that hat he wisled she had been born a man and every one who know her admitted that hat he wisled she had been born a man and every one who know her admitted that hat he wisled she had been born a man and every one who know her admitted that hat he wisled she had been born a man and ev

If Jack had heard this little speech he would probably have remarked sarcastically that his good mother was quite aware of Miss Lydia's tender years when she invited her to the house, and that Lydia would have been better liked if she had been willing to make love to Jack himself. At quite an she invited her to the house, and that Lydia would have been better liked if she had been willing to make love to Jack himself. At quite an early period of her visit, however, Lydia informed Jack that she had not come there to set her cap for him; that she did not want him and in fact would not marry him on any consideration. In this way she speedily won his friendship, and the two became what Lydia described in her own vernacular as "chums." They were constantly together, and if it had not been that Mrs. Halsey had herself overheard Lydia's declaration of principles to Jack, she might have believed they were becoming attached to each other. As it was however she said nothing and patiently awaited the time when the departure of Lydia would enable her to bring to her house some other young lady with more correct views of matrimony.
