An Old-Fashioned Child.

By RUTH CAMERON.

Do you like to read diaries, famous ones, I mean? In the same proportion that I love to read biographies, I don't care for diaries. An effort to read Madam D'Arbly's reminiscences has reminded me of, and confirmed me in this prejudice. Never with the one thing that deeply interested me in that book. And that was Frances Burney's attitude toward her father. Frances Burney spent a large portion of her waking time doing clerical work for her father, a musician and writer of some small note. Her own novels were crowded into the spare moments.

Yet She Never Thought Herself Abused.

Yet, in her intimate diary there is never a hint of resentment or rebellion, never a suspicion of her own superiority.

And everywhere there is the most wonderful filial humility. I have copied out some passages because I want some of the young people of the present day to see them. Her father returns from a journey, and she writes:

"The moment he arrived, I forgot everything but the pleasure of seeing him. He was more kind, more affectionate than ever, if possible."

An Example Of Her Gratitude.

Again, without any special occasion, she breaks out in this rhapsody (remember, she did not expect her father to see the diary):

"How strongly, how forcibly do I feel to whom I owe all the earthly happiness I enjoy. It is to my father, to this dearest, most amiable, this best beloved, most worthy of men, it is his goodness to me which makes all appear so gay. It is his affection which makes my sun shine."

Wasn't That Kind Of Them?

But the entry most interesting is this. Her sister had been very ill (apparently with pneumonia, they called it inflammation of the lungs); she had nursed her and had written to tell her father and mother, who were absent. One entry of the diary is full of anxiety, the next of gratitude. The sister is better and "my beloved papa and mamma have both written to us quite kindly."

Quite kindly! Fancy! When I was a newspaper woman I went to interview a new-elected mayor. In his elation he repeated a certain statement several times. The last time the eldest daughter spoke perily up, "Say it again Papa."

I thought of that experience when I read of Frances Burney and her father.

Little Lectures by NURSE WINGARN (Lecture No. 2) "Nerves"

Our nerves are similar to intricate network of telegraph wires. Controlled and directed by a portion of brain—known as the centres—the delicate like nerves radiate in all directions throughout the body. So long as the nerve centres are capable of continuing supplying nourishment to nerves, the nerves will remain strong and healthy. If directly the nerve centres come weakened by overwork or anxiety, they are unable to transmit the necessary nourishment, and the become worn out and "edge". Then it is that a den sound makes you "jumpy"—you get irritable—you are from neuralgia—you are less and depressed. In this condition there is nothing to
