The bride she has taken a fancy sweet That roses for her state are meet; And merrily goes he, nothing loth, To fetch white rose and red rose both. He hirs to the churchyard dread alone; He reads, his love's name on the stone; The fairest roses ever blown Are those upon her grave mound grown. The roses spring white from her snow-white br .w, Will not his true love waken now? The roses red spring from her heart-Will not his true love thriding start?

But little he cares for the dead below; He plucks the richest flowers that blow, Forgets his true love for the bride Who walks, rohe wreathed, at his side.

Twas when he had come to the high church of The roses speke the new bride wore: "Tis oh, for true love," the white rose said, "Tis oh, for heart's woe, I am dead !"

"Tis oh, for my William," the red rose spoke, "For my own love my heart is broke!" "A curse on the bridal," together ort d The roses, "where I'm not his bride!" Twas when to the altar high they came The curse fell on her like a flame; Swifter than winged words can tell, The curse upon her worked its spell. The roses of white shed poison dew That pierced the bride's heart through and through, A poison dew each red rose shed Till pale with death she bowed her head.

Too late does the bridegroom the roses seize; A wail swells through the churchyard trees, As mourn his sweet-voiced welding bells Old love and knew in funeral bells. -Arlo Bate
