Mariani & Co., to the effect that "it is also an agreeable liqueur," but it transpired that this had reference to Elixir Mariani and not Vin Mariani. The mistake was pointed out and Mr. Curry passed on to another line of argument.

Francis H. Holgate, manager for Hooper & Co., testified that he sold Vin Mariani entirely as a medicine and not as a beverage. The dose of cocaine was from 1.5 to 1 grain. There were other wines in the British Pharmacopola that might be compared with Vin Mariani, such as quinine and orange wine, each of which contained from 10 to 12 per cent. of spirits. Dr. W. H. B. Aikins testified that he had prescribed Vin Mariani as a tonic. It was a bona fide medicine and not a beverage. If taken in very large quantities the alcohol in it might have a stimulating effect, but the effect of the coca would follow and be more lesting.

he had no doubt from the evidence that Vin Mariani was an excellent tonic, he had to administer the law as he found it. Per-haps some change should be made in the law, but evidence had been given showing that Vin Mariani contained alcohol. Br. J.E. Eiffet Calledt.

The defence then called Dr. J. E. Elliott, who testified that he had prescribed vin Mariani regularly in his practice for brain exhaustion and anaemia. He considered it non-alcoholic from a medicinal point of view, as the component parts of Vin Mariani neduded in the French Pharmacopoeia clearly proved that the coca was more powerful than the wine used to diffuse it, and consequently the drug would have the primary effect. It certainly should be prescribed by a physician.
