liery Company's dam, where the water of a running creek is stored for the purpose of driving the "washer" at the bunkers. Beneath the dam there is a narrow chan-nel worn in the rocks to a depth of over five feet, while all around there is ideal sometime in the spring. shade for a picnic party.

The young folk were out for a picnic in their way, and some of them got down to the rocky channel of the creek. Among these were Mary Kesserich and Stephanie Slogard. The rocks are slip-pery, and the first hint of danger came when little Stephanie slipped and almost slid into the deep channel. Happily a bigger girl in the person of Agnes Burke had happened along, and she, with Mary Kesserich, drew the little one out of the cut. Undismayed by the dangers of the place, the little ones continued to play around, and a few minutes after Mary Kesserich slipped right in. The chanenl is only about 5 or 6 feet wide, but the edges are slippery and none of the many children around could or dared to reach out to the struggling girl. Mary cried out for help and struggled for life, but she was unable to save herself and no help was forth-coming, and in full view of her playmates she sank to the bottom of the channel. Meantime one of the children had run off home to get help, and Mary's distracted father raced off to the scene of the accident. He plunged right into the channel and brought his little girl out, but she showed no trace of life. Quickly he bore the body home, and Dr. Frost, who had been summoned, tried every means of resuscitation, but without avail. The little one had been too long in the water and life was extinct. This is the first drowning accident of the season here.
