MORE CENSORSHIP.

The censor of morals is abroad in the land. The department of customs has assumed new functions of a high-handed nature—it has become the self-constituted guardian of the people's manners. What books we shall read is to be settled for us by Mr. Collector Patten, what pictures we shall hang on our walls is to be determined for us by any decayed politician who may sit at the receipt of customs. And this is a free country, and this is the nineteenth

By the arbitrary confiscation of some photographs of world-wide paintings-a confiscation made in May last but only now brought to light-the people of Canada must learn that they are not to be the judges of what is artistic, of what is fit forthe ornamentation of their homes. Canadian ind ependence will be a matter of growth, and its development will be attended by good feeling on both sides. It will be the, outcome of conviction on the part of Great Britain and Canada that the interests of both will be advanced by a mutual separation, while at the same time their relations need never be other than of the most cordial character. Commercial independence is the precursor of political independence, and the Mail can not disprove it, although it may deny it.

Many causes for this decline must be taken into account. A profound change has come over the popular belief, and even the Hethodists know that among their congregations there are doubts and questions about the old testament, the miracles, plenary inspiration and other dogmas which were seldom asked and never answered in the days of Wesley and Whitefield.
