Jacquelin & Co., 52 Broadthe purchase of a seat for John Ahearn. on the exchange for the Jacquelin firm for fifteen years. Last week Underhill & Gilmor bought a seat for Philip Mil-ler, sergeant of the messenger boys on the floor.

These promotions of employes These promotions of employes to membership on the exchange caused considerable comment in the street yesterday. In the past the Stock Exchange, with its membership limited to 1,100 men, has been considered as a rather exclusive club, but the signs point toward a distinct change in this respect. The break from precedent came first last spring, when S. S. Schuyler of Schulyer, Chadwick & Burnham bought a seat for one of the firm's office force as a reward for long and skillful service.

One reason ascribed for the promotion of Stock Exchange employes is the heavy business done in securities these days. Messengers and telephone clerks of long experience are qualified to step right into the crowds on the floor and hold up their end. They become distinct assets to their firms without a period of "breaking in."

John H. Jacquelin & Co. are one of the five big odd-lot houses, the details of whose business on the exchange have expanded largely since the period of million-share days began. The firm already has six floor members, and, like other odd-lot firms, has been forced to unusual exertions to execute its orders.

Anthology of Fighting Facts

Collecting Works of Soldiers and Sailors

FOR PUBLICATION AFTER WAR

Material May Fill Several Volumes-Many of Writers Have Given Their Lives

E. B. Osborn, the English author, has been collecting material for a war anthology which will contain only the works of soldier and sailor poets who have served in the present conflict. Shat ncement was made recently by the Official Press Bureau in London, which added that Mr. Osborn had received from all the many fronts on which British troops are fighting a great many poems which have never freen published. The statement reads in part: "Mr. Osborn says it has been a happy task—with many a moment of sadness, though, when the news came that some fighting poet was 'missing' or had fallen in action. In one respect only has the quest proved at all disappointing—from the collector's point of view. Very little original sea verse has come in so far; the naval verse writer thinks he has done his trick of poetical work when he has produced a comacal parody of Kipling or Gilhert, a staye or two of a cheery sea doggerel which runs to a popular tune. It is easy to understand why this should be. When a war is on, 'sea-time' takes up every spark of a sailor's energy (and more), and there is for him no periodical retirement into 'billets,' where contemplation is possible and there is time to beat one's music out." added that Mr. Osborn had received from

Write as They Fight. The muse, however, wears her khaki as a spiritual cantiniere wheresoever Brit-ish soldiers are fighting on land, and her votaries are found in every rank. In all their verse, both grave and gay, there is "nothing within that lowers," they write of war as they know it, of vanished comrades, even of a brutish enemy, without rancor or repining, without ever forcing the note. Variations on the 'Song of Hate,' 'such as the German soldiers write, would seem a waste of time and tisuse. They write, as they fight, like gentlemen. In years to come a balladmaker, piccing together these rough, but pithy or picturesque fragments, may make lays of modern warfare as heartening as the rugged old ballad of Chevy Chase. There is a reality far beyond the "realism" of any literary convention, in the crudest ditties hastily wrought to please their companions. Time will bring out the inner nobility of these fragments and they will be valued as proofs of the joyous and lofty morale of Britain's new army, in which the spirit of the "old army" is marching on.

Grenfell's Gem.

"In their serious verse the British soldier poets do not fall below the high spirituality of Rupert Brooke's immortal sonnet and Julian Grenfell's cestatic (Into Battle,' and Charles Sorley's bleak but cordial lyrics (as stripped of mere ornament as Greek poetry), and the tender tribute to a fallen friend, which is the one poem left us by 'Billy' Grenfell, scholar, athlete and soldier:

Oh, heart-and-soul and careless played their verse, both grave and gay, there is "nothing within that lowers;" they

"A passionate love of country, white and glowing, and not to be anatomized in ics and isms, is a dominant note in all the true war poetry. It often, of course, expresses itself in grateful remembrance of the old school—all the famous public schools have had their tribute, a hard catch in a match behind the trenches on one occasion conjuring up a vision of spacious playing fields by the seashore. And all these soldier-poets are mother-lovers (seeing in a mother an incarnation of maternal England), a most beautiful proof being a long poem by an beautiful proof being a long poem by an officer of engineers, in which all the busy hours of a long day are dedicated to his mother, being enhanced and irradiated by the love which prompts Colwyn Phillips to cry:

Every day and every hour I have battened on your power.

You, my loved one, and no other, You, my only lovely Mother, You, the pilot of my soul! "And yet the other, the later beloved, is also a symbol of the lovely land, 'seven or eight worlds away,' to the soldier in the trenches. He sees her 'across seas of eves and dawns,' he knows her as im-mortal as England, as in these most
