

THE LIGHT AT THE EVENTIDE.

BY LILLA M. ALEXANDER.
The day had been lonely and dreary,
And my spirit partook of its gloom,
As restless, and sad, and unquiet,

Eight or ten of the children are consistent members of the church. Some of them became officers in the church; one is a minister of the gospel; one is a missionary to China. No poverty among any of them.

THE FARM.

While rains keep the leaves of weeds moist there is little use of putting either hoe or cultivator among them. Covering the top with fresh earth is the only way to kill weeds in wet weather.

Enough weeds can grow along an ordinary fence row out of the reach of the plough to seed abundantly acres of land, thus causing a hundred times the necessary amount of labor to keep the fence row clean.

A PROFITABLE ROTATION.—If a farm is running down and the owner getting poor there is no rotation that will turn the tide in favor of profits more promptly than rye, clover and sheep, says the American Agriculturist.

Butter kept in brine. Year after year a California dairyman keeps "the best and richest butter" that is made in May, June and July—by a simple process, which he describes in the Chaffin Courier.

THE HOME.

A Word to Parents.

BY ONE.
Don't be forever scolding or reprimanding your children, especially in the presence of strangers. Of course, children need to be instructed, and sometimes reproved; but to be constantly scolding them, and depriving them, and comparing them unfavorably with others, is an inflexible recipe for making them sullen, hateful and unpliant.

TEMPERANCE.

Every Man's Right.

You are wasting your time and strength in trying to reform the world on the drink question. Every man has a right to do as he pleases, and you might as well try to stop water from running down hill as to stop men from drinking liquor when they want it. It is my right, and it is every man's right, to drink or let it alone.

Anecdote of Phillips Brooks.

The great divine has no stronger interest in the world than that which he feels for the young men who sit within reach of his voice. Last winter he noticed three young men who came to hear him quite regularly, and as they looked like workmen he took pains to find out who they were, and made an opportunity to speak to them.

A great many people say there is nothing in the Christian discipline of a household. Let us see. In New Hampshire, there were two neighborhoods—the one of six families, the other of five families. The six families disregard the Sabbath. In time, five of these families were broken up by the separation of husbands and wives; the other, by the father becoming a thief.

use of intoxicating liquors, as his father had said, few were aware of the fact. When the hotel was completed and opened to the public, he was its popular landlord, while still attending to his farm.

Debits accumulated, and his stock of goods was sold at auction to meet the demands of his creditors. This, although what might have been expected, hastened the impending disaster.

The hotel became notorious as a resort of the most dissolute, and after finding it impossible to effect a change in this respect, Mr. Warner refused to let it be sold for sale. He parted with it at a heavy loss, yet with a feeling of intense relief.

His son, then thrown out of business, attempted to find employment as a clerk or agent, but no one would trust him. He was obliged to live in his father's house, where mother and sister tried in vain to reform him.

Necessity compelled him to earn money in some way, and after a period of enforced idleness, he engaged in manual labor wherever he could find the opportunity. He ditched, sawed wood, mixed and carried mortar, and, in short, did anything and everything the poorest man would do.

"Dan Warner has been on a spree for a week," remarked a bystander. "He ran himself out of pocket, as he always does when he gets started, and has had to go to work again. The old man won't give him a cent, and won't have him around either, when he gets on a drunk, so he has to start out for something. This is pretty tough work for him. It is all he can do to keep his end of the roller moving, and I should think the very sight of the streets would make him desperate. He must think of the time when he was counted among our prosperous men. If I was in his place, I would work where I was rather than here; I would starve before I would sink to such a depth."

"Staring is not so easy," was replied. "Besides, a man makes his money to buy liquor, and liquor Dan Warner will have at any cost. His father will feed him rather than have him go hungry, but liquor is under lock and key in that house."

"I suppose the old man drinks the same as ever."
"Ye, and always will, though two of his boys have been ruined by it, and the other two have escaped only because their wives had power to hold them to total abstinence. Dan has gone down a little lower than Dan, but they are both pretty near the bottom of the hill."

They are nearer the bottom of the hill now than when this was said. They are poorer, too, if possible, although Dan, as he is familiarly called, continues to earn enough to supply himself with liquor. A week's work would buy a week's debauch, when he hides himself in some wretched place, where even his father will not intrude.

Once this father visited every saloon and hotel in town, asking the proprietors not to sell to his son; but, as might have been expected, his request was treated with contempt. Said one saloon keeper:

"The first glass of liquor I ever drank I bought in your hotel. Dan sold it to me, and part of the profits went to you. You said everybody had a right to sell or drink, just as they please, and I believed you. I am taking my right to do both."

"When the law shuts down on me, as I expect it will, now the women are making a fuss about it, I shall stop, and not before. As long as I sell anybody, I shall sell to Dan, then he has no right to do to trust him on such bills; I found that out some time ago. Sorry I can't oblige you, Mr. Warner, but business is business, and my business is selling liquor."

Mr. Warner could make no reply. He remembered when the widowed mother of this very man had begged him for the sake of the young men of the town to close the bar of his hotel, and he had told her that his hotel was run to make money, not to save anybody—young or old. So he went his way with bowed head, thinking it may be, regretfully of the past, yet giving no sign.

He is still living, and still a moderate drinker, while his son is a drunkard of the lowest type. Each exercises his right to decide for himself in regard to the use of intoxicating drinks; but, also, no power of theirs can make it possible that the consequences shall fall only upon themselves. Experience and revelation alike teach that no man liveth to himself alone.

A few years since, a clergyman, eminent for scholarship and a clear outlook into the future, said to me with marked emphasis:

"The time is coming when the curse of intemperance will have assumed such gigantic proportions that the people of the country will be forced to rise in self-defense and crush the monster. It can not be done easily, but it must be done, or we shall be utterly ruined."

Has not that time now come? If not, what new developments are required to arouse us to a sense of our danger.—N. Y. Temp. Advocate.
