Training War Horses.

140,000 Mobilized in Twelve Days.

While there has been little cavalry fighting in the present war, the demand for horses has been unprecedented. Before last August the Army possessed only 25,000 horses, but in the first twelve days of the war the Army Remount Department mobilized 140,000 more.

These horses are mainly required for artillery and transport work, and to meet the requirements of the Army depots have been established throughout the country, where the horses are collected, trained, the sick ones cured, and drafted to the various centres as required. Incidentally it might be mentioned that of the sick and wounded horses, 60 per cent. return to the ranks.

The depots are in charge of riding experts, most of the sergeants having served in cavalry regiments. As a body the men at the depots are attached to the Army Service Corps, and start at 1s. 6d. a day. In one depot, the commander of which is Lieutenant-Colonel Jessel, M.P. for South St. Pancras, who served in the 17th Lancers, there are nearly 6,000 horses, many of which are recovering from a sea journey; but three days in hospital under veterinary surgeons make a wonderful difference to them. At 100 forges farriers are busy shoeing, and the expeditionary manner in which the animals are dealt with may be gathered from the fact that of 1,000 horses received during one day, half were promptly dispatched to the place where they were required.

Russia's Brave Troops.

Before war broke out Russia was credited with possessing by far the largest army on a peace footing in the world. It was estimated at 80,000 officers and 1,300,000 men, of whom over a million were combatants. The peace strength of Germany was about 850,000; of France, 800,000; of Austria, 500,000; and of Italy, 400,000.

Every year in Russia rather more than 1,300,000 males attain the age when they are liable to military service, but only about one-third are called to the colours ordinarily and embodied, the "annual contingent" amounting to some 450,000 men. From her vast extent, and owing to special local conditions, the Russian army was divided into four parts, each of which was an army in itself with features of its own, though all, broadly speaking, had a similar basis. These four armies were the army in Europe, which was composed of twenty-seven army corps; the army of the Caucasus, of three corps; the Transcaucasian army, of two corps; and the Siberian army of five corps. The whole formed a grand total of thirty-seven army corps, each approximately consisting of 45,000 men.

In addition to her army corps and rifle brigades Russia had in peace twenty-three cavalry divisions each 4,500 strong when mobilized, and vast numbers of Cossacks, estimated at about 250,000 effectives. Germany had nothing approaching such an army of horse as this, only having eleven divisions of about 3,000 each when she declared war.

The imperial ukase ordering mobilization, which was issued throughout Russia at the end of July, 1914, called to the colours 2,000,000 men of all arms, but this great host was rapidly increased, as Russia had immense reserves. German and Austrian military authorities stated that she had more than 7,500,000 trained men at her disposal.

Long ago, says the "Field," the German Chancellor admitted, not, it may be supposed, without fear, that she possessed a practically inexhaustible supply of men. As the Russians themselves say, "Old Mother Russia has sons enough." In many crises of the war she has exhibited an astonishing resiliency, a truly admirable power of recuperation and recovery; when she retreats it is to gain new strength, to bring up fresh forces, to renew the conflict.

His Imperial Majesty the Czar is, as a matter of course, at the head of the Russian army, but its direction is in the hands of its Great General Staff, the chief of which is the Grand Duke Nicholas, the Generalissimo, with General Janushkevitch as his Chief of Staff, a man of whom it is said that his countrymen expect to find him a strategist of the calibre of Moltke.

The Grand Duke is surrounded by a brilliant array of experienced high officers, and together they form the brain of the whole army. When commander of the Petrograd area, the Grand Duke, who is an enthusiast in the profession to which he has devoted all his life, did a great deal in the way of originating and carrying out army reforms and in raising the army to its present excellent standard of strength and efficiency. His conduct of the operations in the field since the war started has shown such shrewdness and ability that by general consent he has been pronounced one of the greatest military leaders of this or any other day.
