HELEN MOIR

Love and Honour.

A TALE OF THE CLYDE. CHAPTER XIV. HELEN REMEMBERS THE HOUR AND POWER OF DARKNESS—PERPLEXITY OF RITCHIE DUNLOP—HE MAKES AN AMAZING DISCOVERY.

He was evidently approaching them stealthily, and but for his long shadow cast athwart the ground by the declining sun, his presence would have been unknown to them. Seeing, however, that he was observed, he changed his gliding motion into his usual shambling stride, and came up with a grin upon his ill-favored countenance.

"I did not know you were here. I could not think where you had gone to," was his abrupt observation addressed to his master, who had by this time risen to his feet.

And as Jaquin spoke thus he cast a keen rapid look of inquiry at both their faces in succession, as if to read the subject of the conversation which he had just interrupted.

"I walked out after dinner," said Bridgenorth in a quiet tone. "You, I found, had gone out; and as I came through the wood I noticed you in conversation with a man I have sometimes seen walking about—a Frenchman, I think he is."

"Oh—all—yes," replied Jaquin, with momentary confusion. "I met him accidentally down in the hollow, and, being both strangers to this place, we spoke for a moment or two; that was all. I have been at the inn since that, and, finding you out, came in search of you."

"I am just returning to the inn," said Bridgenorth, assuming a hard, cold, indignant tone. "Then, after a moment's pause, he continued: 'I have just been asking after the—'—the young lady whom you and I had the good fortune to assist the other evening. This man tells me she is nothing the worse for her mishap.' 'Didn't expect she would,' rejoined the hunchback, drily. "She did not seem even to be much frightened."

"Ye are right there, friend," observed Ritchie. "Miss Heelan is none o' yer nervous, screeching young ladies, that gang intae hysterics at the least appearance o' danger."

"I am glad to hear it," said Bridgenorth. "Good-day, my friend. Come, Jaquin, let us return."

These words Bridgenorth uttered with great haste, and before Ritchie could say anything in reply he walked forward, the hunchback following close at his heels.

No motion did Ritchie Dunlop make so long as they were in sight, but lay still as a stone in his recumbent position, his two eyes watching their retreating forms till they were lost in the distance. Then he sprang up, with wild amazement pictured on his face.

"My God!" he ejaculated, "as I'm a leevin' man, that Master Winthrop. In the name o' a' that's awfu', what has brought him here?—and just at this particular time too. Ah, I ken hoo the Frenchman got the secret now. It was frae that lappish-lookin' humpback; and him pretendin' that he had met me this afternoon by chance for the first time, when I saw them together last night. There's treachery gait on atween them, or I'm cheatit."

"Mercy me, and that's Maister Winthrop. He thinks I dinna ken him. He's sair changed, nae doot, and it was lang or I could gather where I had seen him, but it cam' on me at last like a fire-flame, and in a moment I kent him. The young face soon oot frae beneath the auld scamed one, and the Maister Winthrop o' former days was afore me."

"What a dreadful business this will be! Will he mean to mak' hissel' kenned tae Heelan?—may he want tae tak' her awa' wi' him? Oh, I fervently trust and pray he'll do neither the one or the ither. He ca's hissel' Bridgenorth. Does that not point tae intended concealment? Surely it does. But then, there's that sly, cunning, malicious fellow, the humpback. It's like he'll pit a' oot. Oh, dear, did sic a mischief as this ever happen?"

And Ritchie, more helpless, bewildered, excited, and dismayed than ever, went to and fro under the trees, trying, but ineffectually, to see what would be the issue of the complicated situation.

One thing, however, he firmly resolved on, and it was this—not to mention to Ewing being the discovery he had made, that David Bridgenorth was that very father of whose crime and possible existence Helen had that day learned for the first time. He would wait and watch the train of events; but would most emphatically refrain from saying or doing anything to precipitate or aggravate a state of matter which seemed to be fraught with pain and sorrow.

"Greenland's Icy Mountains," about which the churches so often sing, are far from being the abodes of healthfulness. About half the population of Greenland belongs to the Lutheran communion, and the whole country is well supplied with churches, parishes and catechists. The salaries of clergymen range from $800 to $1,400, which is better than the average in this country.
