There is a tradition that the executioner did not, as was usual in such cases, hold up the head of he Duke to the people, but let it simply drop into the basket, the supposition being that he was bribed to bring it secretly to the church and place it in the vault, where it was found by the Earl of Dartmouth. The story is doubted by a former vicar, who writes to say that it is more probable that "the head belongs to some unknown person of later times."

agree with the motion without any controversial remarks.

Hon. Mr. Laurier, referring to a portion of Mr. Mulock's remarks, said all appreciated the motives of the mover, but the Premier's speech would imply that there was some necessity of renewing their expressions of loyalty to the British Crown. It was needless to say there was no such necessity from any quarter of Canada, because there was nothing but unswerving devotion and loyalty to her Majesty. The eminent qualities of her Majesty, both as Queen and woman, had made the question of loyalty not only one of duty, but of love in the hearts of every one of her subjects. He was afraid, however, there was a mistake sometimes made that what was mistaken for disloyalty was only a natural anxiety shared by all Canadians for the future of their country. For his part he indorsed every word of this address with all his heart; but, speaking in candor, he did not expect Canada forever to address with all his heart; but, speaking in candor, he did not expect Canada forever to remain a colony. There was, of course, no necessity to go into this now. At present their citizenship was adequate to their requirements. Still he believed under British connection this might be improved, and be the subject of future discussion. He could not lose sight of the fact that at present there was a movement for and be the subject of future discussion. He could not lose sight of the fact that at present there was a movement for imperial federation, which implied that our present relations with Great Britain might be improved. It did not follow that these relations were unsatisfactory, but that they might be improved. He agreed with that sentiment that their relations might be improved by closer relations at present. They might at some future time be improved in other ways, but, whatever was their future, as long as they remained as they were to-day they were all happy to express their attachment to the Crown of England and to the person of her Majesty.

He would bring down the correspondence. The motion carried.

Hon. Mr. Mitchell was glad to hear that this motion was not based on any antagonism to the people of the United States, but merely to correct a misapprehension in the American press. He was not an annexationist or an advocate of independence, but Mr. Laurier was reasonable in declaring that Canada could not always remain a colony.
