siderably broken up over the accident. Said a Tacoma seafaring man, speaking of the Umatilla's mishap: "I have to the sahore at once in thick weather between here and Seattle some five or six years ago. You know pilots have to blow their whistles in a fog at short intervals. They often have to depend on the echo of the whistle to determine how near the shore they are. But sometimes the condition of the atmosphere is such that the echo can't be depended on, which is sometimes causes serious results."

the Umatilla began to move perceptibly, and finally, when the Corona put on her full power, the big ocean steamer let go her hold on the ground, and amid the cheering of the crews and blowing of whistles she glided out into deep water. Capt. Carroll, of the Corona, deserves high praise for the excellent skill with which he managed the difficult and important task.
