the event, it may be known from admiral Holbourn.

These are the proper sources of intelligence; and it is upon these and no other, we should found our good or bad opinion, our censure or applause of distinguished per-There is great merit in the action, when men of rank and affluence expose themselves to the dangers and fatigues of war for the publick benefit; and we ought to look on those who do it with a high respect. rank or influence should screen the guilty from infamy or punishment; but it becomes the publick to be very fure of facts before they form injurious suspicions. If it become a practice to indulge this difingenuous and indecent conduct of railing without cause, at all who do not succeed, we shall disgust those who are fit for high employments; and no man will undertake the service, but he who fets no value on his reputation.
