containing young foxes, digs it out, taking any black or cross fox pups it may contain abandoning the others. The freshly turned earth and the disturbed condition of the surroundings frightens the mother fox with the result that the young, abandoned by the hunter are also abandoned by their parent and left to perish.

It is reported that many of the black and cross foxes which are taken from the den, after being kept for breeding purposes are merely held in pens until their skins become prime the following fall or winter, when they are killed.
