

YOUTHS GO DIPPY OVER MOVIE QUEEN

Two Youngsters of Montreal
Steel Money to Take a Trip to New York in Search of Their Screen Idol.

Montreal, Sept. 25.—All for love of a movie queen, could be used as title for a scenario from real life, the details of which have come to light here. The principal characters in the scenario are two juvenile Lotharios, aged 14 and 15, and belonging to this city. The opening scene of the plot is in Montreal, the second in New York, but the tragic denouement is played in the juvenile court here, amid sombre surroundings and shattered illusions.

The dramatic personae of the piece, the two youths, were ardent patrons of the movies, but for them the cowboy brand or Jesse James type of actor held no thrills. Their idol was no more male, but one of the most popular actresses in screendom. Few were the films in which she appeared that the youthful admirers did not see. But a picture as only a picture after all, and despite the phenomenal advance made in cinematography towards realistic effects the youths decided that nothing but a view of the movie queen in person would be all-satisfying. But as her studio engagements require the lady's presence in New York, the youths decided that for them it must be another case of Mohammed and the Mountain. So they decided that see their idol they must. To get to New York funds were needed. This obstacle was overcome by selling a hundred dollars from the parent of one, while the other youth contributed his share to the joint fund. With this generous share of wealth they arranged with a taxi driver to take them from this city across the border line to a point in New York State and from there they made their way to the American metropolis.

The maddening thrills, and the sky scrapers, elevated and always had no terror for them and to one of the city's most imposing hotels they directed their steps. Ensnared in the hotel they laid their plans, members of the party securing a glimpse of their idolized movie queen. Opposite the hotel was a park. Movie actresses, although pictures rolling through the streets in limousines, are human after all and often walk for exercise; so the lady concluded she might stroll through the park. They knew their opportunity is sparing in her visits, and the lady of their dreams might pass their way but once. Thereupon they decided to take turn about on a park bench, relieving each other at intervals.

But despite their vigilance the sunshine of the lady's smile did not flash their way; meantime funds were considerably lower with them, and a friend here was sent in an emergency call for pecuniary help. Also the families had started a search, and while one of the gay young Lotharios kept lonely watch on a park bench two strangers approached, one a New York detective, the other a Montreal sleuth. And with their coming, came the end of the dream.

When the Montreal detective stepped up to the lad on the park bench he recognized the youth as the object of his search and broke to him the news that he had come to take him and his companion back home. As he questioned the lad the seriousness of the youngster's mien struck a human chord in the burly officer of the law. "Suppose you had met your movie queen what would you have done?" "Well, I'd have gone up to her and spoke to her and asked her if she liked me," the youngster's reply. "Do you suppose a movie star would notice a little boy like you?" "She might; I know a boy at the boarding school where I go and he knows another boy that a great actress saw when she was in Montreal and she liked him and adopted him and now he's an actor. And that's why we came here."

But the enamored youths were led back to the hotel where the situation was explained to the management and the homeward journey started. Before long they were arraigned in the juvenile court here for theft, money all gone, illusions shattered and even a glimpse of their movie queen.
