SING A SONG OF SIXPENCE.

The Westminster Gazette offered a prize for the best re-writing of "Sing a Song of Sixpence" in the style of any other poet. This parody of Rudyard Kipling won the prize:

A tale for a tanner, I'll tell you, whose pockets are filled with rye,
How a couple of dozen blackbirds were baked in a salt sea pie;
How deep in the royal dagger dug deep in the smoking thing,
And how the song of freedom those birds began to sing.

The hungry king to the office went, to see his cash was right,
While the queen walked round to the Ladies' Club, and ordered refreshment light.
Never a king so noble, never a queen so kind,
But the warning note of a blackbird rang out on the wild west wind.

The washing had long lain reeking in the wrack of the soapy foam,
The maid gave thought to the morrow, for they wanted the washing home,
She wrung, she wringed, and she rinsed them, those royal garments fine,
And she clamped the fluttering remnants to the slack of the wind swept line.

Swift as a flying bullet, wings glimmering through a salt sea pie,
The outraged form of a blackbird (and that leaves twenty-three);
He lands on the maid on a bucket, her hands are stretched to the clothes,
And with thoughts of his frizzled feathers, snapped left off her nose.

At a point where the perpendicular wall of the canyon juts out about 200 feet above the canyon bed a thin, snake-like fissure runs in the rock. Successive generations of Indians have gone to the place at regular intervals and shot their gayly befeathered arrows upward, forming a fringed scarf unique in its oddity. The arrows are so thick that little room is left for more, and owing to the position of the derelict shelving wall the relics, undeterred from the weather, have stuck where they were driven in uncounted years ago.

Already relic hunters are visiting the place and despoiling it of its treasures by shooting the arrows out with revolvers and rifles. In the sands of the bed of the canyon many arrowheads of various sizes and shapes are found. It is believed that the Indians visited this spot in connection with some rite. Curious, strange figures have been cut by them in the face of the rock walls.

Good suggestion.

ARROW CANYON.

Odd Way in Which Its Walls Were Decorated by Indians.

Thousands of arrows shot by bands of Indians for possibly centuries protrude from a fissure several hundred feet long in the rocky walls of Arrow Canyon, about twenty miles from the crossing of the Salt Lake railroad over the Moapa river, says the Los Angeles Times.

At a point where the perpendicular wall of the canyon juts out about 200 feet above the canyon bed a thin, snake-like fissure runs in the rock. Successive generations of Indians have gone to the place at regular intervals and shot their gayly befeathered arrows upward, forming a fringed scarf unique in its oddity. The arrows are so thick that little room is left for more, and owing to the position of the derelict shelving wall the relics, undeterred from the weather, have stuck where they were driven in uncounted years ago.

Already relic hunters are visiting the place and despoiling it of its treasures by shooting the arrows out with revolvers and rifles. Curious, strange figures have been cut by them in the face of the rock walls.

FA PRIMITIVE SPOT.

Virginia's Peculiar and Isolated Island of Tangier.

In Chesapeake bay, 125 miles south of Baltimore, with which city communication by boat three times a week may be depended upon during the summer season, is the strange island of Tangier, so completely isolated from the usual lines of travel that it hardly seems possible that it can be a part of the state of Virginia. . . . Imagine, if you can, an island about five miles long and three-fourths of a mile in width, with a population of nearly 1,500, where each house is connected with Chesapeake bay by a tiny canal; built homes along one narrow street but nine feet in width, without sidewalks, roadbed or gutter; an island where the women go about with bare feet and calico gowns during the week and where the men leave for their work at an early hour on Monday morning and remain away until Saturday afternoon; an island where intoxicating liquors are not sold, where billiard rooms and pool rooms are unknown; an island where one physician and the minister constitute the professional class; an island where profanity is punished by fine; an island without a jail or lockup and where religion is the rule and to be outside of the church is to be outside of the pale of the best society; an island where public cemeteries are unknown and where the dead of each home are buried in the front yard. If you can imagine all this, you may have some faint idea of the peculiar surroundings of the inhabitants of Tangier.

BIG HARDWARE

Three Lucky People.

By the death of an uncle in Australia, Private Frederick Kelly of the 3th Royal Irish Fusiliers, or Monaghan Militia, unexpectedly finds himself heir to a fortune of close upon £14,000.

In an old armchair purchased at auction at Townshill, Donegal, by Mr. Henderson, the buyer found a leather purse containing nearly £200.

After living alone for many years in a small cottage at Dover, England, an aged woman named Mary was found dead in her bedroom, and in crannies and crevices all over the house were found packets containing gold, silver and bronze. So far £187 has been found.

Why He Was Discharged.

A man charged in a London police court with carrying a pistol said he had bought it for self-protection, as he was "going to America." He was sympathetically discharged.

And every girl should read the following particular books:

Boswell's Life of Johnson, Smiles' works, Dr. Ball's work on astronomy, Hugh Miller's Schools and Schoolmasters, and Old Red Sandstone, Ruskin's Sesame and Lilies, Darwin's works (if her teachers would permit it).

Montagu, Lady Mary Wortley, Miss Austen, Miss Yonge, Scott, Thackeray, Lord Lytton, Dickens, Lord Macaulay, Browne, Carlyle, Ruskin, Charles Reade, Matthew Arnold, Charles Lamb, R. D. Blackmore, Lord Beaconsfield, Charles
