The British National Insurance Act.

How Lloyd-George's Much-Discussed Bill Works.

Much interest had been aroused in industrial circles throughout the world by the British national insurance act which came into operation on July 15. It was bitterly assailed by its Tory opponents who accused its author Lloyd-George, of saddling the country with an expensive and unworkable scheme, rabidly socialistic and blindly Utopian. The English people, however, have had practical demonstration of the benefits of old age pensions and other radical measures passed into law by their courageous and reforming Chancellor of the Exchequer. They were willing to let their verdict wait the test of actual experience, and, with further knowledge of the immense blessings it will bring to 14,000,000 people, the act has been generally conceded to be a wonderful piece of beneficent legislation. Probably it is not quite perfect; nothing human is. Most probably it will need future amendment, but it is a decided advance in the interests of the working people and a step forward that they are not likely to surrender.

Every man and woman, between the age of 16 and 70 and earning less than $15 a week, must get an insurance card, on which there are 13 spaces for 13 stamps, and each space bears a date for 13 weeks. On each of these spaces an insurance stamp must be affixed each week, of the value of 14 cents for a man and 12 for a woman. These stamps are not ordinary postage stamps, and cannot be used for letters, nor can postage stamps be used for insurance cards; but special stamps can be obtained from the post office.

It is the duty of the employer to buy and see that these stamps are affixed in their proper places on the card each week. Part of the cost—8 cents for men and 6 cents for women—each week will be deducted from the wages of the insured person. That is to say, if you are a man you pay 8 cents and your employer pays 6 cents, and if a woman the employer pays half the cost of the stamp, that is, 6 cents.

At the end of the 13 weeks, when the card is full, it must be handed in at the postoffice, or a member of an approved society—that is, a sick benefit society, insurance company or trades union—must return it to that society, when another card will be furnished for the following quarter. The benefits under the act for those who are members of an approved society are: Sick pay, at the rate of $2.40 a week for men and $1.80 a week for women, for 26 weeks, commencing on the fourth day of sickness, provided that the insured were not over 50 years of age on joining. After 26 weeks $1.20 a week will be paid in each case for the remainder of the illness. There are proportionate sick-pay benefits for those over 60, and for unmarried males and females under 21; but in no case does the benefit commence before the insured person has been a member of an approved society for six months, nor does it continue after he or she has reached 70 years of age. No contributions are payable on reaching the latter age. The old age pension act then comes into operation.

In addition: the insured person is entitled to certain other benefits. These include free medical attendance, and medicine, maternity benefit, freedom from distraint during sickness, and certain other benefits. The wives of insured men, although uninsured themselves, receive the maternity benefit, and if the women is an employed contributor she will also receive sickness benefit.

In connection with the sanatorium benefit, it is intended to establish sanatoria in various parts of the country for the specialized treatment of consumption and other diseases. The wife and dependents of an insured person, in addition to himself, may receive the benefit of treatment at such sanatoria.

The insurance against unemployment is voluntary and restricted to one or two trades, but a wide extension of its benefits is regarded as certain in the near future.

The only son of the family was rather refractory, and his mother finding gentle words of no avail, sought to reprove him by means of stern measures. A lively chase ensued between mother and son, and the latter, as a last resource, darted under a bed, where he was safe from pursuit. His father, arriving home shortly afterwards, on hearing of this set off to punish the young hopeful. Stopping down to look under the bed he was greeted with the excited enquiry—"Hullo, dad, is she after you, too?"

OF THE TWO EVILS.

Hostess—"It's beginning to rain. You'll get wet. I think you had better stay to dinner." Departing Guest—"Oh, dear, no! It's not raining so badly as all that!"
