BERLIN, June 29.
The Berlin morning papers, representing all parties, made in considering the tragedy as the outcome of Slavonic embitterment over Austria's internal policy. The Tagblatt says that Serbian hatred for the Austro-Hungarian state was the motive of the crime, and that the Archduke and his wife have fallen victims to the passionate enmity which the Austro-

Hungarian policy has, of late years, awakened among the Serbian peoples.

OTTAWA, June 29.
According to an official report to the Labor Department from its special agent at El Paso, 250 "Colorados" or federal irregulars, who were captured by the Constitutionalists at Salinas, were executed by firing squads. These are accused by the rebels of carrying on rapine and robbery under the guise of war.

ROME, June 29.
King Victor Emmanuel and Pope Pius sent envoys to the Austrian Emperor to-day. The Pope cancelled the St. Peter's Day reception, for which 10,000 invitations has been issued. The assassination of the Archduke Francis Ferdinand created a deep impression throughout Italy, on account of the close relations with Austria. Only recently the signing of the concordat between the Pope and Serbia took place, and it was generally considered that this would tend to diminish Serbian agitation against Austria.

LONDON, June 29.
The morning papers editorially, express strongest indignation and sorrow at the manner of the Archduke's death. The Telegraph says: His death is a serious loss to Europe at large, as well as to Austria. The Times fears that Sunday's events must assuredly add clouds to the political outlook of Austria and Hungary. It thinks that the dual system will probably be strengthened for a time, but the more the Southern Slavonic hopes recede, the greater will be the danger of an ultimate explosion.

Woman Hunts Big Game.

Lady Hunter in London Tells of Jungle Thrills.

Long hours of "stalking" wearisome nights spent sitting over a "kill" awaiting the return of a panther and endless miles on the back of an elephant through thick jungle in quest of a tiger are amongst the incidents experienced by Mrs. Holmes-Tarn, who has just returned from India, whither she accompanied her husband on a shooting expedition, says The London Standard. The pursuit of big game is a sport which is attracting numbers of women.

The sportsman in India may shoot in two ways. There is the one which requires much preparation beforehand, when jungles are plentifully baited in advance with young buffalo to attract tigers to that spot ready for the guns, and there is the other when the sportsman chances his luck in a scratch beat, or a long stalk through the jungles, with a buffalo tied up at random on the chance of "drawing" a tiger. The latter method, more sporting, if also more arduous, was adopted by Mrs. Holmes-Tarn and her husband.

Mrs. Holmes-Tarn's experiences of shooting are not, however, confined to India. She has probably had more round shooting experience than other women. "My first trip was to the Rocky Mountains, in the Wyoming state," she said. "It was a rough trip; sometimes we slept on the ground in the snow. We were after deer, wapti and bears." Later the speaker went to Canada where, amongst other animals, a moose and caribou fell to her rifle. East Africa is, however, her favorite hunting ground. A rhinoceros, shot with a .303 rifle, and an elephant and rhinoceros with a .400, are amongst her most prized African trophies.

"I was trapping small animals for the British Museum that trip," remarked Mrs. Holmes-Tarn, "and managed to capture two new general and ten rare species. Once when Mr. Cunningham and I were out after elephant we were lost for 24 hours, dined off a zebra's liver roasted on sticks and only reached camp thanks to the help of a friendly herdsman. Another time it was touch and go whether we were charged by a herd of elephants, but fortunately, they stampeded in the opposite direction. To my mind there is no country like East Africa for shooting. Snap-shooting and stalking through the jungles in India may please people who have not shot anywhere else, but East Africa spoils you for other countries."

Beware of the "Lycol."

On the gate of the garden belonging to the editor of a well-known horticultural paper there is affixed this notice: "Beware of the Lycopodium!" This big metal notice was placed there in order to frighten away flower thieves. It was so successful that it deterred everybody, and the tradespeople refused point-blank to risk their lives; they would sooner lose custom.

Various guesses were hazarded as to the identity of the "Lycol," as it is called in the neighbourhood. Some declared it to be a wolf, a snake like a boa constrictor, a sort of hyena, a stinging toad, an Abyssinian lion, a jaguar, a savage vulture, a mandril, and a blood-sucking vampire.

It became necessary to inform the tradespeople that it was kept confined during the day and was only roaming about at night. One day a man called with a load of manure for the editorial garden, and he was very "nervy" about the notice.

Although he was reassured, he looked about apprehensively all the time. When he had brought in his last load and was bending down, the editorial cat, a large Persian, playfully leapt on his back, and shrieking horribly, the man fled—likewise the cat.

As a matter of fact, lycopodium is the name of a tiny moss that grows on the rockery near the garden gate.
