HOW LONDON WAKES TO WAR

By R. Sims, in British War

Pictorially

At six o'clock in the morning, when the sun is still low in the sky, the world of London, as we know it, is a different world. The streets are empty, the houses are dark, and the only sound is the distant rumble of the war.

At seven o'clock the great terminus is a scene of intense animation. The departure platforms are crowded with khaki. The arrival platforms are filled again and again by the "inflowing tide of humanity." Train after train arrives from the suburbs and environs of London and discharges its freight, and from a dozen platforms a broad stream flows out into the world of work. The war has made a marked difference in the character of these mighty streams of humanity, that converge upon London in the early hours of the morning. The few young men in them seem to be tossed to and fro like derelict spars by the surging seas of femininity.

Soon after seven there are hundreds of young girls in the incoming crowds. Some of them are not going direct to their work. Their offices and places of business will not be open yet, and so the station waiting-rooms are packed with them and many of them find resting-places in such of the City churches as open early for their accommodation.

These girls are compelled to come to their work with time to spare. If they left it till the last train they might fail to find room in it; then they would be late at business. This fear of being late has a marked effect on the attitude of the crowds that are now beginning to wait for tram-cars and motor-buses. Everywhere you see anxious faces and eyes peering eagerly into the distance.

There is a notable change in the character of the morning invasion as the hours advance. The majority of the girls in the seven o'clock crowd are young and pale and poorly dressed. Their skirts are skimpy, and there is little attempt at finery. They carry their mid-day meal in a brown-paper parcel, and many of them have a well-worn paper-covered six-penny novel under their arm.

At eight o'clock there is an appreciable difference in the type of inflowing femininity. The girls are older. Many of them are young women and women who are not so young. They are fairly well dressed, and they carry their provisions for the day in an attache-case. Many of them have a novel in volume form under their arm, and some have brought flowers from the garden. It may be to adorn their office desk, or it may be as a friendly offering to a fellow employee of the other sex.

At nine o'clock the young women who flow in graceful streams along the City ways are quite daintily and fashionably dressed. They wear silk blouses and carry vanity bags. They do not carry brown-paper parcels or camouflage their food in attache-cases.

Their salaries permit them to lunch at a restaurant.

In the nine o'clock crowd there are many more men than there were at the earlier hours of the morning.

By ten o'clock the City and the West End are wide-awake. Londoners are up and out, and the great world of London is at work to win the war.

You have only to watch the awakening of London to understand how great and glorious a part women are playing in the world's fight for Freedom.

From East and West and North and South since the earliest hours of the new-born day a noble army of women has been spreading itself over the capital to be the working bees in the great hives of industry connected with the war and the munitions of war, to take the place of men in all the industrial and commercial, and clerical occupations.

It is small wonder that our hearts are filled with pride when we realise how great an Imperial asset woman-power has proved itself to be in the Empire's hour of need.

Letter of Sympathy.

St. John's, Nfld., Nov. 15, 1918.

Mr. S. J. Macpherson,

City.

Dear Sir and Brother,—We, the members of the N. I. W. A. Co-operative Committee in meeting, convened, desire to respectfully tender to you and Mrs. Macpherson our deep sympathy with you in your sorrow on the death, through illness, of your son after four years in the service of his King and Country.

As a brother whom we all esteem highly it is with deep regret we have learned of the sad affliction with which your home has been visited at this time when humanity in general is rejoicing over the dawn of peace.

On behalf of the Committee,

Yours fraternally,

JOHN CALDWELL, Chairman.

Mr. J. JAMES, Secretary.

JAMES BAIRD, Treasurer.

Naval Secrets.

There are some things that money cannot buy, among them the secrets of our silent Navy. There exist confidential volumes on wireless signals, codes, books on gunnery and torpedo matters, all of which are kept as securely under lock and key on board ship as are treasures in the Bank of England.

The safeguarding of the Navy's secret library on a battleship is a special little ceremony in itself. Every officer who keeps watch has to satisfy himself when going on duty and when being relieved that the books are in their respective chests.

Special keys relating to these chests are retained by the commanding officer and his second-in-command. The keys are tested frequently by the naval stores officer in dockyard to see that they are correct, and have not been tampered with.

It is necessary to destroy a reference book. Two officers then burn the book until it is reduced to ashes. Before destroying it, the number and title must be accurately recorded and its fate entered in the ship's register.

Super War Bread

It is an Englishman's prerogative to grumble, and perhaps his pet theme to-day is war-bread. "How can we be expected to eat this stuff?" he asks, but he goes on eating it, just the same, and thrives on it.

The next time you are inclined to grumble at your loaf or to quarrel with your roll, think your stars instead that you are not eating German war-bread. Then, indeed, your sighs might be justified. According to the "Deutsche Tageszeitung," the authorities of Leipzig recently made an examination of the bread Fritz was baking. And the authorities held up their hands in horror! They found feathers and thread and wadding and wood. They found paper and straw and splinters and sand. They also found lysol, gypsum, and chalk!

Honorary Chaplain

Department of Militia,
St. John's, Nfld., Nov. 15, '18.

Editor Evening Telegram.

Dear Sir,—I am very pleased to be able to state that a letter has been received by Capt. A. Clayton from the Chaplain's General Department, War Office, stating that he has been appointed as Honorary Chaplain to the Forces. An extract from the letter reads as follows:

"Rev. A. Clayton,
Sir,—I am directed to inform you, that in recognition of the services rendered by you in the Army Chaplain's Department, approval has been given for your appointment as an Honorary Chaplain to the Forces, 4th Class.

A notice to this effect will appear in an early issue of the London Gazette."

I am, Your obedient servant,
(Sgd.) E. H. PEARCE,
