CHAPTER XIX.

LOVE REVEALS ITSELF—A DISCREETABLE INTERRUPTION—THE OUTCAST.

"You married!" he gasped, and the whiteness of his face could be seen in the shadows. "Married—and to Duncan Ralston! Oh, heaven—Lillias, Lillias."

What a depth of woe was in that loud cry—what pain, what agony! It came to the ear of Lillias with the startling force of a great revelation, and its intensity for a moment paralysed her. She turned towards him, and the expression of his countenance made the revelation complete. The silent look that passed between them was eloquent to both their souls and produced a conviction which no spoken words could have made clearer. In that look their mutual love was revealed and significantly acknowledged.

Nor was it a time for such a revelation to produce its usual ardent effects—blushing cheeks, drooping eyes, and half-averted faces. It was made in the presence of a fact which must prove its death-blow; therefore it was incapable of being accompanied by the sweet and thrilling results which usually attend on such confessions. The knowledge which had forced its sudden manifestation closed the door of hope upon it at the same moment.

Still, one result must follow the revelation which shone so clearly in both their faces, and in a moment it took place. With another passionate cry of "Lillias," George bent towards her with open arms, and she uttering his name with accents of love, threw herself within their encircling fold, and was once more lying on his bosom and pressed close to his heart. This told their love to the full, and they consciously accepted it as an open confession.

In the strength and whirl of their sensations, in the first resistless outflow of their deep, pure love, all was forgotten in the joy of their unweaving, and for some moments they breathed forth their mutual affection without reserve.

"Oh, Lillias," said George, at length, "we have not realised our love only to be separated from each other? Surely it cannot be that hearts knit together as we find ours to be doomed to be sundered? Your father will never be so cruel, so merciless, as to blight our lives by driving you to the altar with one for whom you have no regard."

"Alas, George!" murmured Lillias, "I fear it will be so. My father is one who will not be turned from his. He has an iron will—he has no faith in love or affection—worldly considerations are all in all with him; and these are all arrayed on the side of this hateful marriage that I have no hope he will relent in his purpose."

"Oh," exclaimed George, "I know—I feel—how mad, how presumptuous I have been in daring to lift my heart to one so far above me—I, a poor, friendless youth, without money, without family, without one single social claim. I should have seen the danger, and slumped it, for both our sakes. But, oh, Lillias, I was oblivious of the truth. I knew not whether we were tending. I was so glad and so grateful for your kindness that I thought not of the danger of accepting it. And so responsive was my heart to your goodness, your beauty, your virtue, and all your matchless excellence, that I entered further and further into the heaven of your society, and insensibly our affections have become centred in each other. But God knows, I had no design in this; it has all come to pass without thought or purpose, and now we are bound by a chain of love which can never be broken. Forgive me, Lillias—oh, forgive me—for doing you this terrible wrong!"

Latest from Manitoba. Fort Garry, Sept. 21.—It was reported last night that the Government had sworn in as special constables the French half-breeds from St. Boniface, to come over and make arrests. This excited the Canadian party, who began to arm to protect themselves. The military were called out but no disturbance occurred. All is now quiet, and likely to remain so if no arrests are made.

Fort Garry, Sept. 24.—It is reported to-day that two hundred French half-breeds have been under arms for the last three days at St. Boniface, and mounted. A guard has been kept on the Government ferry by rebel half-breeds. It is also said that they have arms supplied by Government. The half-breeds are pushed on by French Canadians. The excitement has now subsided, and work is going on as usual.

It is said that the Chief of Police has warrants for the arrest of several citizens. Attorney General Clark says he will resign the Attorney-Generalship at the next meeting of the Local Assembly.
