

The Rival Clansmen

A Scottish Vendetta.

CHAPTER XIX.

THE PURSUIT.

"Donald Cameron, I say, give up your foul purpose."

"For God's sake, M'Kenzie, let us gain the boats; M'Leod is at hand."

"Boats! They have boats, then, and may yet escape him. Hector's head swims as he hears the words, and he staggers and stumbles amongst the snow."

"Come, Ian M'Kenzie, and keep your vow now. Hector M'Leod is ready to meet you."

"There is no response, and breathless as he is he again cries—"

"Mean coward, you are afraid to run the risk. You would rather have your dead father's curse upon you than run the chance of a cut in a fair fight."

"Cameron, shall I turn to meet him? Heard ye what the wild-dog cried?"

"I had been stung by his words, and he asked the question in a passionate, hasty tone."

"No; there is Loch Maree; thirty yards further and we can laugh at him."

"Hector M'Leod is n a' them! Oh, will he be able to overtake these villains before they reach the boats? There are other men than Donald Cameron and Ian M'Kenzie there. He can see that now, and yet they fly before him."

"Towards, towards, all of them, Flora, Flora, are you to be lost? No, no, forward still."

"He has reached the high overlooking the loch, and it lies spread out dark and deep before him. The descent is rugged and treacherous, and rendered more treacherous now by the covering of snow, and the outlaws are slow in their descent."

"But a few yards only separating them Hector bounds after, regardless of danger to himself."

"Courage, darling; I come to the rescue."

"Curses upon him. Here, Gregor, drag her to the boat until I turn upon this bragging fool."

"And Donald Cameron, pushing a still straggling female, muffled up so that she was helpless to render herself any assistance, towards one of the men in front, turned and drew his claymore from its sheath."

"With the force of an avalanche Hector was upon him, and he was borne backwards, down, down, with the young Chief, whose footing had slipped, rolling above him. Suddenly a sharp pain shot through Hector's head—a pain as if a knife had been driven in to the hilt—a hundred lights danced before his eyes, and a ringing sound filled his ears. Something resembling the discharge of firearms, followed by a woman's piercing shriek, roused him a moment from his stupor, and then he knew no more."
