"Wait till after dinner, Hope," said the banker, graciously; and Hope waited till after dinner; then, when the lights began to shime out one after another in the Main Street of Fendie-the more diprified shops of Fendie are resplendent in the glories of gas—and Hope was quite sure that her friend Adelaide would be getting ready to start, and that she herself would scarcely have time to assume the new silk frock which Mrs. Oswald feared could not fall to receive extensive damage this evening, her father at last was ready to accompany her, and they proceeded to make their important purchase.

the other end of the street shot strengely up, making its sharp point visible against the clear, blue such above; and the sweet voices of the children, is their monotonous chans, were in harmony with the time.

The banker was not castly moved by the asthetics of common life; but the society of his favorito melted his heart.

"Where have these children learned to move so gracefully, Hope?" asked Mr. Oswald, in the incautiousness of his gracious mood; "they might have been with the French dancoing master, whom your friend A delaide speaks so much about."

"The French dancing master, papas?" exclaimed Hope; "He could not make people graceful; she only knows how to put her feet."

Mr. Oswald lanched.

feet—"
Mr. Oswald laughed.
"Weil then, Hope, what about these little girls 'it must be natural to them."
Hope began to tremble as she adventured her first direct experiment.
"I think I know what is is, father,"
"Well, Hope?"
"It's because—because they have a gentlewoman to teach them," said the brave Hope, with a considerable tremor.

Mr. Oswald looked grave and frowned; he had lost his interest in the children; but his frown only provoked the bold spirit of his favorite daughter, who knew her own power.

had lost his interest in the children; but his favorite daughter, who knew her own power.

"They are only commen people's children," continued Hope, with a good deal of warmth; "but they have a gentlewman to teach them, papa; and Miss Swinton says that is the way to make people graceful. I am sure it is too—for if you only saw the girls who are not with Heien Euchanan!—because it's not being rich that does any good—people might have all the money in the world, and only be common people; but Helen Buchanan is a gentlewoman born!"

The banker wisely withdrew into the shop, and, busying himself about the nuts pretended not to have noticed the energetic speech which made Hope's cheek burn and her eyes glow in the delivery. Mr., Oswald was considerably afraid, for he saw that Hope was by no means an antagonist to be despised, and did not well know how to meet her fiery charges. Hope was indifferent about the nuts; she had begun her campaign, and felt all the glow and excitement of her first declaration of war.

In the mean time, Lilias Maxwell had settled down quietly into her corner of Mrs. Buchanan's parlor. The rapid sympathy of Helen had already gathered up the loneliness, the wants and yearnings of the orphan, and all that were in sorrow had an unfailing claim upon the pity and tenderness of her mother. The callm face, so pensive and pale, and thoughtful, and the unquiet face with ite constant life and motion, contrasted strangely, so near to each other; but their diverse currents of life had yet many points of harmony. Each was the only child of her mother; each had the self-knowledge which comes in solitude, and as they talked together, each came to recognize thoughts like her own, in a guise and form so different, that strange smiles almost mirthful brightened even the sface of Lilias as they grew familiar. The stranger very soon ceased to be a stranger then, for even Mossgray was not so like heme.

CHAPTER XL

The auld guid wife's weelhoordet nits By Mrs. Ollphant.

"I am very glad to see you, Mias Maxwell," said Helen, earnestly, and then who too stopped and became embarrassed, and looked at the door for her mother—but her mother did not come; and Helen glanced up with admiration and quick liking into the quiet pensive face whose steadiness she could not but envy, and feither own, variable countenance burn as site registed—indeed Fam very gid, said the composed and gentle Lilias, who was less swiftly moved than Helen. "Hope told me you had compassion on my solitude, Miss Buchanan, and encouraged me to ask you, but there is the part of the mother, each had the self-knowledge which comes in solitude, and as they talked you must have no confidence in Hope."
"But you must have no confidence in Hope, are gards us," said Helen, recovering the realf, "for Hope is my aworn knight, and has been my mother" for Hope is my aworn knight, and has been my mother will you come and see my mother?

Mrs. Buchanan was prepared the parlor with lifeien. And then as Lilias, the motherieses, received the cheerful kindly greetings which is face of the Lily of Mossgray was not an unexpressive ons; that the large darf but each seed to be a stranger then, for oven Mossgray was not an unexpressive ons; that the large darf but each seed to be a stranger then, the large darf but each seed to be a stranger then, the face of the Lily of Mossgray was not an unexpressive ons; that the large darf but each seed to be a stranger then, the large darf but each seed to be a stranger then, the seed the seed to be a stranger than the seed the seed the seed to be a stranger than the seed the seed the seed the seed the seed to be a seed to be a stranger than the seed to be seed to be a stranger than the seed to be seed to be a stranger than the seed to be seed to be a stranger than the seed to be seed to be seed to be a stranger than the seed to be seed to

There was a good deal of the mist of frost in the bracing, pleasant air; but high above the haze was a cold, distinct moon. It did not east down a very clear light, however, through the veil which hung between the earth and the sky, and the youngsters in the Main Street of Fendie decidedly preserved the shon-windows.

Opposite the important shop of Mr. Elliot Bell, the principal greeer of Fendie, a group of little girls were eijoying themselves in the bright spot illuminated by the lights within. They were performing one of those childish dramas which look like relies of some early stage not without a certain art in their construction.
