History of Toronto

"The Natural History of the Toronto Regian," published by William Briggs and edited by James Faull, B.A., Ph D., and edited by James Faull, B.A., Ph D., of Toronto University, includes contributions by local scientists on subjects relating to the fauna and flora of the Toronto district. It was prepared specially for the convenience of the delegates to the International of the delegates to the International Geological Convention, which has just been held in this city. The work is of particular interest to scientists, but will also prove of interest to the general student who would like to become familiar with the city's history and especially with its natural history. The opening chapter is entitled "Toronto, an Historical and Descriptive Sketch," and is written by Professor Keys, also of Toronto University. He Keys, also of Toronto University. He gives an excellent review of the early sives an excellent review of the early history of the city and its development, its present population, industries, its educational equipment, and many other phases of the city's growth and life. A chapter on the Indians who formerly inhabited the region at the west end of the lake and those who lived at the mouth of the Credit gives some interesting detail with regard to their customs. It seems that even in those days, as now, the Island was looked upon as a resort for the indisposed. Professor Coleman, Ph. D., F.R.S., contributes an article on the F.R.S., contributes an article on the geology of the region and gives prominence to "Lake Iroquois," the great lake that formerly lay in the basin formed by Queenston Heights, the "Mountain" at Hamilton, and the Davenport hills. Toronto, Hamilton, and many other places are built upon what was formerly the bed of this great lake. He also describes the process by which Niagara Falls has receded from Queenston, the time receded from Queenston, the time taken for them to assume their preposition, being estimated as years. Climate has been dealt with by R. F. Stupart, F.R.S.C., director of the Meteorological Office, which consists chiefly of records of temperatures. In the botanical and zoological section there are eighteen chapters. It is interesting to the general reader to know that in the zoological department there are recorded forty-one species of animals, two hundred and ninety-two hirds and alexant the section. ninety-two birds, and eleven reptiles, the latter all being harmless. A numr of good maps are also included in

Life of Jesus

Rev. Dr. G. H. Gilbert, in his new voiume, "Jesus", published by the Macmillan Company, makes many assertions regarding those who would take out the sayings of Jesus as recorded in the Gospel, as unhistorical, and who cast out the Bible stories of the birth and infancy of Jesus, the stories of His walking on the water, feeding the five thousand, the changing of the water into wine and similar deeds. Dr. Gilbert rejects the foctrine of a material resurrection, and believes that Jesus after His crucification, continued to live, and that His duciples had visions of Him. The change in the disciples from a band, of sarinking followers to frigaphant and during advocates, he argues must have been on account of their frequent visions. their frequent visions of Him whom they leved,

In a final word the author says: "In these days when parents send their boys to school, and see little of their children save at holiday times, something to draw father, mother and children closer together is eminently to be desired. Motor camping does this. I how realize to the full how closely our common experiences in camp life knitted us together. I know more about and am closer in touch with my boys, and they are closer in touch with their father and mother than they could ever have been but for our common experiences in camp life." ### Miss Mystery

"Miss Mystery". is the name given by Etta Anthony Baker. to the heroine of her romantic novel, bearing the same title. The solving of the identity of a young and beautiful girl, who has evidently met with a serious accident, which deprives her of her memory, and who is found lying on a bed in a house where she is entirely unknown to the occupants, forms the principal part of the story. The doctor is at once called in and after examining the case, says that the loss of memory may continue for a long time, and suggests her removal to a hospital. The hostess, however, takes such a kindly interest in the girl that she keeps her at her house, where she becomes a part of the family, and endears herself to everyone with whom she comes in contact. The mystery is absorbing, and the story is delightfully sweet and refreshing. The characters are beautiful Miss Mystery unwittingly breaks the hearts of two or three susceptible young men and causes a good deal of anxiety to a young lady friend, but in the end all matters are straightened out, all are the very best of friends, and tho the development is, at times exciting, it is without exaggeration. A small boy, or at least, a very young man who has just fallen heir to his older brother's evening "suit" and wears it for the first time, even tho ne has nardly reached the "coming out" age, gets himself constantly mixed up in the love affairs of his elders, and thus provides a thread of humor, which runs to the end of the story. Miss Mystery is an appealing heroine, and the characters of the group surrounding her, are exacedingly well drawn. Mrs. Baker's style is simple and direct and is well adapted to the subject in hand McClelland and Goodchild are the publishers.

Muscle Control

Athletes and others interested in physical culture will be interested in a new book entitled "Muscle Control." by Maxick and published by Ewart Seymour & Co., London, S.W.; price 2s. 6d. The book contains 54 full page photographs from life, demonstrating the most modern method of acquiring muscular development. In the preface the author says: "The text and photographs have been prepared with the idea of meeting the requirements of the ordinary physical culture, and for that reason all Latin names have been excluded except where absolutely necessary: simple descriptive terms being used, so that no anatomical knowledge is necessary to understand the work."

"Stop talking nonsense, child, or you'll make me cross with you." cried Mildred "If your father was here I would willingly let him get a force at the mansion and start out without waiting for Mr. Gray." Shephard was in Chattanooga and would not return for two days. "Run away now, Elmer, and leave me alone. I want to think this all out by myself," added Mildred.

It was only Gordon's cheerful letters that had prevented Mildred from going distracted. The situation had been a most peculiar one. In every one of the letters Gordon had told her not to begin a search for him and she had been afraid to ignore his request. Gray had insisted more than once on taking the matter in his own hands, but Mildred had flatly refused to allow him to make a move.

"He is writing these letters to me, Mr. Gray, and they clearly say not to seek him," she told him the last time they had talked the matter over.

"That is because he was forced to write it, otherwise they wouldn't have delivered the letters." replied the superintendent. "If he doesn't turn up soon. Miss Deery, I'm going to take matters in my own hands."

"To Be His Wife.

"Plezse don't, Mr. Gray." she pleaded. "I am sure something dreadful would happen if you failed, and we would never see him again."

"To Be His Wife.

"Plezse don't, Miss Deery. But in a way I am responsible for his safety. With you it is different."

CHAPTER XLL

With the exception of the news of Gordon Kelly that Farnsworth, the newspaper man, had secured from Mildred Deery at her bungalow, and which was published in his paper, the great basebail public had heard nothing of the $50,000 player since the day late in May when he left the hospital in Atlanta and disappeared. The public knew nothing of his palatial home in the Georgia mountains; it knew nothing of his father's death. It knew nothing of the grand romance of Gordon and Midred, or of Gordon's conflicts with Forrest Cain, or of his capture and detention by the mountaineers. All the public knew was that Gordon Kelly, the most widely advertised ball player in the world, the man the Red Sox had paid the stupendous sum of $50,000 for, the player every "fan" on the American League circuit was most anxious to see perform, had mysteriously disappeared.

BY A. H. C. MITCHELL

Mildred called Elmer and told him to bring the runabout, and together they went to the mansion to find Gray. They went to the mansion to find Gray. They were told that he had gone to Atlanta on business, but would return next day. On the way home Elmer said:
"Let's not wait for Mr. Gray. Let's find Gordon and rescue him ourselves."
"You foolish boy," replied Mildred."They would capture us, too, and then what a fine pickle we would be in. We must wait for Mr. Gray and he will take plenty of men with him."

Elmer Would Fight.
"Oh shucks, Mildred." exclaimed the lad. "Gee whiz, I could take your rifle and you could take your revolver and we could sneak up and catch them off their guard and rescue the prisoner. Come on, Mildred; let's do it."
"I'm afraid your spirit is better than your judgment. Elmer," said Mildred with a sigh. "Goodness knows I hate to wait until Mr. Gray gets back, but I don't see what else we can do."
Elmer kept teasing all the way home and when they arrived he brought forth his father's maps of the region and they spent a long time pouring over them trying to figure out the exact spot where they thought Gordon was held a captive.
"Be game, Mildred." said Elmer, re-"Be game, Mildred." said Eimer, returning to the attack. "Only four men are there. We can get the drop on them his wife."

Gray's eyes opened wide at this piece of information, and Mildred added:
"Please say nothing about it. I only tell you so that you can understand how vitally interested I am in his welfare."
Sitting alone on the porch the day she discovered the hidden meaning in Gordon's letters, Mildred went over the whole situation in her mind. Gray was absent, Shephard was absent. Gordon had long expected help. She knew not where to turn. At last she arose from her chair, and, going to the telephone, called up the mansion, and said:

"Please tell Steve to come to Miss Deery's house at once with Mr. Gordon's new car. Please ask him to hurry."

Several Special Features to Be Included in Miss Haswell's

Tomorrow (Thursday) morning at ten o'clock the plan for the Press Club's Theatre Night (August 21) will open at the Royal Alexandra. Miss Percy Haswell will personally sell the first ten seats. Every seat in the house except the boxes will be on sale and it will be a case of first come first served. The first to come will have an absolute choice of seats. Those who have already purchased tickets will have to present them for reserved seats. Sir John Gibson and the government house party will be present, and it is almost certain that the Duke of Connaught will also be resent, and it is almost certain that the Duke of Connaught will also be represented.

Miss Haswell will present several special features for that evening only, and there will be in addition to "The Runaway" the play the Miss Haswell company will present. There will be no passes of any kind honored on the evening of the play. Every newspaper man in the city has tickets to sell. All persons attending will have a souvenir.

Glaze.

WILL you please give directions for making glaze; we have a great deal of soup and I know it furnishes the basis for this handsome decoration.—Constant Reader."

Any rich meat broth cooled and freed from fat will make glaze when it is reduced by simmering, to a rich, dark brown liquid. Veal is generally used for this as it contains so much gelatine.

To make from the beginning, stew a knuckle of veal, one pound of beef, one onion, one turnip, a little celery, four whole cloves, one table-spoon of salt and three quarts of water four hours. Remove the meat and strain the liquid. Cool and lift off the cake of fat that forms on the top. Reduce by simmering until dark and rich.

This makes a perpetual stock and is invaluable to draw upon in emergenices, especially for those who do not make soup every day, as a tablespoonful dissolved in hot water will make a bowl or plate of satisfying soup. A small quantity will season meat sauces or gravy.

For those who cannot make soup often glaze is preferable in every way for the four hours' boiling of meat is a nuisance, usurping a large part of the range, using a great quantity of fuel and making a strong odor of cooking thruout the premises. Glaze once prepared can be kept many months in a cool place.

Its uses are far reaching and wide spreading. It gives a beautiful gloss to a plain roast. Broiled fowl spread with glaze and returned for a moment to the oven, after it is dressed for the table, looks as it should, juicy and moist.

There are a number of bouillon cubes now on the market that are nothing but meat stock reduced to glaze and dried until entirely free of moisture. They are all excellent for short order work, but do not have the flavor and richness you will find in the home-made article.

I am always pleased to answer questions and give special methods and recipes on request. Address Miss Grauel care this paper.
