G R E A T S I R ,

 HOUGH I am sensible, that in approaching the sacred scenes of your retirement, I should take off my shoes with reverence ; and that the mysterious dignity that attends you is sufficient to keep far off the profanum vulgus ; yet, Sir, presuming upon the privilege of a worthy Briton, and Fellow-labourer, employed in the same great work, I shall make no apology for obtruding myself, uncalled, upon your leisure. Permit me, Sir, to say my vanity has not been a little flattered by the Similarity of Character which it has pleased many judicious
