WORKMAN DROPS DEAD.
KITCHENER, Sept. 12.—While walking to work this morning, Arthur Townsend, aged 44 years, dropped dead on King's street. He moved to this city from Goderich two months ago and has worked since then at the Dominion Tire factory. He is survived by his wife and two children.

RUSSIA'S DOWNFALL FOLLOWED SPREAD OF COMMITTEE RULE

Mrs. Pankhurst Tells Audience Soldiers Would Debate Before Going "Over Top"—Urges Women to Look After "Home" Front.

Often great things come from little causes. So the mighty modern movement toward the political enfranchisement of women had its chief incentive in the persistent bravery of the little woman who almost unnoticed drifted into the G. T. R. station yesterday afternoon to fulfil an engagement to speak before the united Men's and Women's Canadian Clubs of this city. And as she appeared on the platform last evening in the Marine Temple to speak on Russia, whether she was sent by the British Government on a political mission, she commanded the almost breathless attention of men and women alike, so filled was she with enthusiasm and a power to convince.

Her mission to Russia and the impressions she got while there, in the light of later historical events, show what a keen appreciation she has of the historical significance of certain undercurrents which the ordinary man or woman fails to notice. "We were absolutely satisfied," she declared Mrs. Pankhurst, after describing an interview with Kerensky at Petrograd, her mission having been to tell him as well as other influential Russians, just what the British people thought about the war and how they would continue to fight until world freedom had been secured. "While the Allies were being deluded into the idea that the Russian Provisional Government was disintegrating, breaking down her strength and paving the way for Lenin and Trotsky, who came after, whether consciously or not, Committee Rule.

Committee rule was in force, and every institution was governed by committees. No officer could get an order obeyed until a committee of soldiers had decided whether to obey it or not. If a battalion was ordered to go over the top, a committee of soldiers sat on the edge of a trench and decided whether they would go or not. Revolutionary soldiers soon became commanders-in-chief, and wanted to be obeyed by the soldiers. Why, the very soldiers in the hospitals sat on committees to decide whether they should obey their nurses and doctors.

I want the businessmen to listen closely here, because the committee rule seems to have spread from Russia to the European countries, and even to America. "In Russia committees of workmen sat smoking and talking all day, deciding whether to obey the rules of their employers or not. It was a trouble with Russians is that they can talk and talk and talk, but they have very little energy and initiative, which makes them the prey of the Germans who have very good initiative and a great deal of energy, and are excellent hands at controlling people.

Malignant Influence. "Can you wonder that I went home impregnated with a realization which was a malignant line of influence was at work in Russia, which was merely a form of democracy, the rule of the masses.

"During the time I was in Russia, Lenin arrived on a special train from Germany to do his work. Kerensky and the rest of them knew that he had German money in his pockets to carry out his policy. They knew that he would be but one more step toward the rule of the world would rule the world. Now, one of the things I saw in Russia was that the workers of the world should rule the world. That is the very thing which we women have been struggling against. We didn't want the rule of the world by the workers, for real democracy, to sanction the rule of any one class. This is the rule of the world by the workers, for real democracy, to sanction the rule of any one class. This is the rule of the world by the workers, for real democracy, to sanction the rule of any one class.

"There liberty," she has been confused with license. You women, can you realize the character of a nation which is trying to establish a human freedom which has no conception of duty to one's neighbor? This idea of freedom means slavery for one sex more awful than the slavery of the other.

Boleshevik Government a law has been passed which first of all states that women are national property. If they go on to say that all women over 15 years are compelled under severe penalties to register at the bureau of free love, for the purpose of public assistance, and that every woman is obliged to take a husband and cannot refuse the man who wants her. But the gravest danger is coming to the home front, we should be willing to help. I know that women have always been ready to care for the sick, but in this war we have become citizens, even though we fought for it most did not want to. We are not expected to fight over there, just because we have been treated as citizens with men, we must fight.

"Let us look after the home front. Let the soldier at home. Let us realize that it is far more difficult for the workman to keep loyal than for the soldier at the front. It is our duty as women to learn to know these workers in the home front. We must realize that the battlefields were not for their support. Learn to know your own women. The nation factories (and I say they are just as fine as the women in England). Men is indispensable to the war. Make them feel that they are not alone in the future. If we could put that thought into the heart of every man and woman we should win this war and realize our highest ideals."

Going to Russia. Mrs. Pankhurst's own account of how she obtained permission to go to Russia and of her experiences there up to the time of her interview with Kerensky was most interesting. "In the United States there were certain people who had a kind of sympathy for humanity and who wanted to go to Russia to help. These were the same people who at the outbreak of the war, opposed it, who said that we should leave the fighting of this war to the Belgians and Russians, who had been browbeaten into it. Although they did go as far as to offer to Belgium that kind of sympathy which we would do, if we should offer words to a hungry man. They said it was a war of imperialism and no affair of theirs. This was at the time when the Duma was being superseded by that strange body of workmen and soldiers, known as the provisional government. Now this mission, which I wanted to go to Russia was a peaceful mission of humanitarianism. Internationalists, who said that the old-time nationalism was worn out and that now was the time of internationalism, and these people had as their chief spokesman an English labor M. P., Ramsay MacDonald.

Put in Claims. "When we women who had suspended our passports for the duration of the war found that these Socialists were being granted passports to Russia, we claimed passports also, because we knew that Ramsay MacDonald would not speak as at night, and I was actually afraid to drive my car around all summer. I cannot praise Tanlae too highly, and have already recommended it to several of my friends. Tanlae is sold in London by Standard Drug Limited, and by an established agency in every town.

Free Agents. "Most official missions have to hear and say those things which the Government wishes them to say, but an independent mission such as ours could investigate as it pleased.

Mrs. Pankhurst told in a thrilling manner the way in which they set about to meet the people who claimed they represented Russia and had set up a provisional government, as well as how they went among the women of that land telling them how the British people were fighting for their freedom, and that they would not entertain any discussions for peace, until the final victory had been obtained and until Germany's ambitions for world conquest were crushed. Her interview with Kerensky, the Russian premier and postmaster-general but led up to her final interview with Kerensky. "When we were in Russia the Kerensky boom was at its height. Every section of the people except the Bolsheviks were cheering him as the man of the hour. Had he been the man we all tried to think he was, there was great hope for Russia at that time, and subsequent events might have been averted. At the time of my interview with him he was almost impossible to see, sitting about as he was from the trenches to Petrograd and from Petrograd to some obscure country district, speaking everywhere all over the country.

Patriotism at Height. "I had just got to the point of concluding the Russian women that they should do everything they could, when the Bolsheviks came, and news of a few victories on the German front. I never saw such a burst of patriotism at Petrograd as at that time. It did seem for about a hour that Russia would find herself again. But it soon all went down. It was a remarkable thing that there was a ball in the streets of Petrograd, one would hear little groups of men talking in German. Then came my interview with Kerensky. He received me in the chair of the Provisional Government. He had taken up his quarters. When I first saw him at close quarters I was disappointed. He was very like one of those curious Japanese masks, absolutely without expression, so that he was of no use to me. He was not hearing what I was saying, which exasperated me very much. He said nothing until I had merely remarked: 'You British people and French people know nothing about us Russians. We Russians know your history and your psychology, but you call us barbarians,' and to the Russian woman who had accompanied me he said in Russian, 'so that I would not hear 'Why do you Russian women listen to these foreign women? You are better educated than they.' And that was all. We knew there was no hope in that direction.

"And so I made up my mind to come to America, because of the fatal delay we were experiencing in regard to Russia. When I came home from Russia it was to persuade the governments of Europe to do something in regard to Russia, for to us intervention seemed the only thing. But something caused the Allies to delay from week to week and from month to month. At the outbreak of the revolution in Russia, the whole civilized world rejoiced that the old aristocratic line was breaking, and we all hoped democratic institutions would be adopted, but we soon realized that revolution in war time in a country so vast as Russia is not only dangerous, but is liable to prove a fatal experience as we have seen today.

WINDSOR, Sept. 12.—Frank Jettings, who was taken into custody at Tilbury on Monday as an alien enemy, and who admitted that he was a native of Germany and had come to Canada in 1913, was sentenced in police court here today to pay a fine of $100 and costs, because he had failed to register. A number of documents found in Jettings' trunk are in process of translation, and until this is done the man will be kept under surveillance.

Handing in Balance. "During the entire time when the fate of Russia was seemingly hanging in the balance, the Germans were arranging everything to suit themselves, as they are trying to do in every Allied country today. They know now that they cannot win by a straight fight, and they are stirring up unrest in their empire, even in our own empire. Our soldiers at the front look facts in the face and there is no danger there. But the gravest danger is coming to the home front, we should be willing to help. I know that women have always been ready to care for the sick, but in this war we have become citizens, even though we fought for it most did not want to. We are not expected to fight over there, just because we have been treated as citizens with men, we must fight.
