ome to time have admirable exceptions. The late Richard Brooking Butland was not millionaire. Compared with some members of our wealthy classes his accumulations were of modest proportions, and his employment of his wealth was unostentatious. This renders his gift to suffering humanity the more generous and acceptable, and a good example to those who might, if they would, give more and peoliticians who have assumed the pairtupot of the deceased's unorthodoxy. He was no vulgar, sneering sceptic, but one who respected other men's convictions and had the courage of his own. His life was one that might well be emulated by some professing Christians who live as though they believed everything. Mr. Butland died in the feet of the surface of the party who have accepted the feet of the surface of the workingmen.

Sir Donald Smith as a Liberal candidate for Winnipeg would be rather a stumbling block to hose members of the party who have some that honest doubt in which be feet.

Mettees.

Just now all Canada is filled with the sound of preparations of a great approaching battle. The combatants are already braying defiance, making feints, stealing marches. The captains have indulged in proliminary blasts of sow-horn. Standards are daily hung out to catch the breeze of popular favor, and daily they are taken down to be embroidered with new devices of more enticing kind. In the open market place, the officers are delivering themselves of exalted sentiments of patriotism, purity and economy. In the lanes and bye-places I the recruiting sergeants, yelept chairmen of polling subdivisions, are dealing sunningly and knowingly in the baser, but courage of his own. His life was one that might well be emulated by some professing Christians who live as though they believe nothing but intend to die as though they believed everything. Mr. Butland died in the honest doubt in which he had lived, but also in the faith that it was proper for him to do something for the alleviation of the human suffering from which neither faith nor doubt is exempt. Under the circumstances his bequest cannot be otherwise regarded than as a noble one, inspired by lofty motives.
