The hon, gentleman who last addressed the committee, as well as many who preceded him, reproached hon, members sitting on this side of the House for not participating cyrists it is the duty of the Legisla-

hon members sitting on this side of the House for not participating more generally in the discussion of this measure. I feel that the course which I have adopted, and which has been adopted by a large majority of those who sit on this side of the House, can be fully justified. I feel that when any member of this House has any information to impart, or any arguments to advance, bearing upon any question under consideration, arguments which are new or forcible, or pertinent, it is right and introduce is an improvement on the system which now exists, it is tion, arguments which are new or forcible, or pertinent, it is right and fair that that member should, under such circumstances, receive a respectful and attentive hearing. But, Sir, when hon. gentlemen pursue an entirely different course; when they rise, as they have done in the course of this discussion, and state facts which are already familiar to us all; when they continue to repeat, one after another, arguments which we have preceded them, I feel that any member of this House is justified in receiving their speeches with inattention and any other marks of disapproval which such conduct of disapproval which such conduct repealed. This course of the Projustly merits. Between wolvestimes and some content of the content of th we can find no parallel in past history, and no reasonable ground for Province from that in which their supposing it will over be equalled in property is situated. In the other the future. If, Sir, to talk longest Provinces this same class of persons and to say least can win for any still enjoys the franchise. In many hon, gentleman honor and renown upon the floors of Parliament, I feel that these same gentlemen must be remembered long after their leaders have property. In some of the are forgetten. Hon, gentlemen have sought to justify the length of this have manhood suffrage as the basis are forgotten. Hon, gentlemen have songht to justify the length of this debate by the importance of the measure which is just now under consideration. I feel, Sir, that this ground is not well taken. It is true that this is an important measure. It is true that this measure deals with the question of the franchise, a question which, above all others, is dear and sacred to the heart of eyery whether such a state of things love and sacred to the heart of eyery whether such a state of things love and sacred to the heart of eyery whether such a state of things love and sacred to the heart of eyery and sacred to the heart of eyery far meters a family is to be supplied.
