Interesting European Items.

(Called from Paris correspondence of the Philadelphia Catholic Times.)

The February number of the Revue de Paris is interesting for a paper on "Le Futur Concile," contributed by Mgr. Boeglin, who it will be remembered was formerly editor of the Moniteur de Rome, in which capacity he was disgracedly expelled from Italy by the Crispi government. The subject is a delicate one for so devoted an admirer of Pope Leo to treat. That the present glorious Pontiff may live for many years to come is the ardent prayer of all as well as of the Monsignor, who has suffered so much in proof of his attachment to the Holy Father. But inasmuch as the fierce controversy is already being made a frequent subject in newspaper articles, thus giving rise to all sorts of absurd rumours and opinions, Mgr. Boeglin has thought it necessary to clear the issue. He is of opinion that there is a plot to choose a Pope who shall be antagonistic to French interests and a powerful supporter of the Triple Alliance. An effort will also be made to destroy the French protectorate over the East. But France is aware of the danger and will be on her guard. The writer concludes with the belief that God will probably assign to His first minister on earth a higher human and social role in order to be in harmony with living realities. "The Sacred Code will soon contain more foreigners than Italians. I know that certain 'patriots' protest against the invasion of the 'straniero.' But it must come. It is in the nature of things, following as it does the pacific conquest made by the gospel. Canada, the United States, South America, Africa, the East, Australia have or will have their Cardinals. The current will break through all lines, overturn all barricades. Colonial politics, the evangelization of far-off continents, the opening out of India and Africa, the events in the far East, all will help it on, and finally make it absolutely necessary. What becomes in presence of some magnificent perspectives, of the miserable and pitiful intrigues of back-stair politics? How vain and frivolous after all are the designs of the local power, which thinks to place the good of Savoy over the thim of St. Peter! The Cardinals, whom it is thought to intimidate, carry in their Catholic soul, in the sanctuary of an incorruptible conscience, in their intelligence penetrated with light and goodness, the secret of the future."

On March 7th a disgraceful scene occurred in the Church of Notre Dame de Clugnanourt, where the Abbe Garnier is preaching during Lent. In response to the expressed desire of Cardinal Richard the Lenten sermons of Paris are this year strictly confined themselves to religious subjects, and Abbe Garnier in particular, in addressing the large congregation of working people assembled to listen to his eloquent discourses, has been careful to obey the Archbishop's directions. The unruly socialists, however, would not be deprived of their sport. They wanted to create a scene of disorder in the sacred building, and they succeeded. About one hundred of them, scattered among the vast audience, were present, and the one for rioting was given by a young man named Louis Bargone, belonging to the group known as "La Jeunesse Revolutionnaire," who cried out as soon as the preacher had terminated his discourse, "All that Citizen Garnier has been saying is tainted and corrupt." Immediately there was a great hubbub. Chairs were both flung in the air and used as weapons. Some serious wounds were caused by heavy blows from fists and sticks. Most of the congregation clustered together in fear and consternation; but there happened to be a powerful contingent of Catholic young men who gave a sturdy resistance to the ruffianly assailants, and finally drove them from the church with ignominy. Several arrests were made, but the prisoners were afterwards liberated. Unfortunately, the eruption of such a vulgar scene is not at all unlikely. A rumor to that effect led to the Church of St. Louis, where Father Forbes, J., was preaching, being surrounded by police agents on March 8, although, and occasionally knocked off the three stones at the door in the Rue Saint Denis, the services passed off quietly. There was a little pushing and shouting when the vast congregation left the church, and one or two arrests were made. The London Daily Chronicle, in an article on these unseemly incidents, speaks words of truth: "Vulgarity and violence appears to be the characteristic note of a certain section of revolutionary French socialists, who never open their lips or take any action whatever without being offensive. Some of these gentlemen have taken it into their heads to do what is with them an unusual thing, viz, to go to church. The church to which they adjourned was in Montmartre, and the preacher was the Abbe Garnier, a Christian socialist. He was not preaching on political matters, but that was of no importance to the revolutionists, who merely desired to engage in the despicable entertainment of insulting a good and earnest man. They came to scoff and they remained to scoff in such a manner as to disturb the whole congregation, until finally the police knocked them off the head and put them out. The incident is significant as indicating the character and temper of some of the wild-breed regenerators of society."

The famous palace of Arignon, in which the Popes resided during the fourteenth century, is now occupied by a regiment of dragoons. The admirable paintings and frescoes, it is said, are being much injured by the building being turned into a barracks. Happily this state of things will not be permitted to go on. Some distinguished French artists have formed themselves into a committee, with a view to prevent the utter destruction of these national memorials. The idea is to open a subscription, so as to build new barracks and present them to the War Department. The palace of the Popes thus evacuated would then be restored and turned into a huge museum of ancient art. It is to be hoped that the scheme will be successful.

M. Joseph Reinach, Deputy for the Basses-Alpes, has astonished everybody by publishing in the Paris Matin an article protesting against the government proposal to impose a special tax of thirty per cent on the goods of religious communities. This fiscal measure is undoubtedly a grossly unjust step on the part of the Ribot Ministry, and will probably be rejected by the Chamber; but no one expected that the first to publicly protest against it would be Joseph Reinach, the friend of Gambetta and Felix Ferry, the two foes of "clericalism." M. Reinach's act is a courageous one. On the other hand, it was time for a Jewish voice to speak out in favor of the great majority of the population of France. In putting all their influence on the side of the adversaries of religion, the Jews of France have but themselves to blame if the Catholics look upon their race with disfavor if not hatred. M. Reinach regards the government proposal as a crime against "egalite" and boldly declares that it will be defeated. The following remarks are both instructive and admirable: "Amongst the threatened congregations are those very foreign missions which, in the East and the far East, have been the precursors and most ardent apostles of French influence. Gambetta proclaimed it, and Paul B. R. scarcely had his foot touched Tonkin, made the same avowal. Nor are those truly worthy Little Sisters of the Poor who honor not only France, but humanity itself, to be exempt. Seriously, is there any necessity to reduce misery's budget at the very hour when misery is leading to a social revolution, at the hour when hatred and rivalries are doing their utmost to bar the route and erase the name of France all over the world?" M. Reinach considers it would be disgraceful to treat these good people as if they were the worst enemies of France, and concludes with the words: "We will refuse to vote this law."

Whether M. Joseph Reinach is taking the first step to Canossa or not, his example is not the only instance of a greater regard for the Church on the part of public men than hitherto we have been accustomed to. The radical anti-clerical M. Brisson has had little surprise for us. On the 6th inst. the President of the Chamber gave an official dinner at the Palais Bourbon, and the other two men were prepared, one for those who took meat and the other for those who observed the Lenten regulations. Who would have believed this ten years ago, of so intolerant an anti-clerical, a liberal penser of the first water? But age and responsibility have overshadowed the intemperate zeal of the statesman who even now has not changed his political opinion that the goods of religious orders ought to be confiscated, because religious communities had no right to existence. The event has not been allowed to pass unnoticed by scoffing Parisians, but M. Brisson, quite equal to the occasion, gave an explanation next day which is very creditable to him. He thinks that the time has come to display mutual tolerance. Whilst objecting to being coerced by the Catholics, he is being also studied. What the President of the Chamber wants to see Frenchmen of all creeds and opinions working together for the good of the republic, a result which will never be attained whilst there is a lack of tolerance and irreconcilable towards each other. On this account he thought that it was only proper courtesy on his part to study the feelings of his guests whether Catholic or not.

The duel between Captain Le Chatelet and M. Percher, which ended fatally for the latter, excited great emotion in Paris. As a rule French duels are of the most harmless character, but there is always a possibility of a disaster—by mis-
