"What?"

"That you were such an ill-tempered un-would have liked to strike her companion. This stung the maiden into absolute defiance.

"I dare you to touch me!" she cried. "Strike me if you dare, madam! I am not airaid of you—what do you mean by such an action as that?"

Miss Aldelyffe was disconcerted at this unexpected show of spirit, and ashamed of her unladylike impulse now it was put into words. She sank back in the chair. "I was not going to strike you—go to your room—I beg you to go to your room," she repeated in a husky whisper.

Cyherea, red and Janting, took up her candlestick and advanced to the table to get a light. Standing close to them the rays from the candles struck sharply on her face. She usually bore a much stronger likeness to her mother than to her father, but now, looking with grave, reckless, and an ungered expression of countenance at the kindling wick as she held it slanting into the other fame, her father's features were distinct in her. It was the first time Miss Aldelyffe had seen her in a passionate mood and wearing that expression which was it varibly its concomitant. It was Miss Aldelyffe's turn to start now; and the remarks he made was an instance of that sudden varibly its concomitant. It was Miss Ald-clyffe's turn to start now; and the remark she made was an instance of that sudden change of tone from high-flown invective to the pettiness of curiosity which is often makes women's quarrels ridiculous. Even Miss Aldclyffe's dignity had not sufficient power to postpone the absording desire she now felt to settle the strange suspicion that had entered her head.

"You spell your name the common way, G. R. E. Y. don't you?" she said with as-Alddyffe then, had recognized ner at last, and had been curious about her name from the beginning.

The other members of the household had retired to rest. As Cytherea went along the passage leading to her room her kirts rustled against the partition. A door on her left opened, and Mrs. Morris, looked out.

"I waited out of bed till you came up," she said, "it being your first night, in case you should be at a loss for anything. How have you got on with Miss Aldelyffe?"

"Pretty well—though not so well as I could have wished."

"A little."

"She's a very odd lady—'tis all one way or the other with her. She's not bad at heart, but unbearable in close quarters. Those of us who don't have much to do with her personally, stay on for years and years."

"Has Miss Aldelyffe's family always been

"Has Miss Aldelyffe's family always been rich ?" said Cytherea.
"Oh, no. The property, with the name, came from her mother's uncle. Her family is a branch of the old Aldelyffe family on the maternal side. Her mother married a Bradleigh—a mere nobody at that time—and was on that account out by her relations. But very singularly the other branch died out one by one—three of them, and Miss Aldelyffe's great-uncle then left all his property, including this estate, to Captain Bradleigh and his wife—Miss Aldelyffe's father and mother—on condition that they took the old family hame as well. There's all about it in the Landed Gentry. "It's a thing very often done."

"Oh, I see. Thank you. Well, now, I am going. Good-night."

CHAPTER VI.

THE EVENTS OF TWELVE HOURS.

1. August the ninth. One to two o'clock, a.m. Cytherea entered her bedroom, and flung herself on the bed, bewildered by a whirl of thought. Only one subject was clear in her mud, and is was that in spite of family discoveries, that day was to be first and last of her experience as a lady's maid. Starvation itself should not compel her to hold such a humiliating post for another instant. "Ah," she thought with a sigh, at the martyrdom of her last little fragment of her self-conceit, "Owen knows everything better than I."

She jumped up and began making feady self-conceit, "Owen knows everything better than I."

She jumped up and began making feady for her departure in the morning. The tears streaming down when she grieved and wondered what practical matter on earth she could turn her hand to next. All these preparations being finished, she began to undress, her mind unconsciously drifting away to the centemplation of her late surprises. To look in the glass for an instant at the t effection of her own magnificent resources in face and shoulders, and to mark their attractiveness unadorned, was perhaps but the natural action of a young woman who had so lately been chidden whilst passing through the harassing experience of decorating an older beauty of Miss Aldelyfle's temper.

orating an older beauty of Miss Aldelyffe's temper.

But she directly checked her weakness by sympathizing reflections on the hidden troubles which must have thronged the past years of the solitary hady, to keep her, though so rich and courted, in a mood so gloomy and repellant as that in which Cythera found her! and then the young girl marveled again and again, as she had marveled again and again, as she had marveled before, at the strange confluence of circumstances which had brought herself into contact with the one woman in the world whose history was so romantically entwined with her own. She almost began to wish she were not obliged to go away and leave the lonely being to loneliness still.

MR. HEATON says:

"It is with no small degree of pleasure we announce that the 'Glasgow and London' have selected the 'Glizens,' a purely Canadian Company, as the one in which to reinsure their business. From October First, therefore we assume not only all liability for losses occurring thereafter, but also all losses which may either have remained unpaid or unadjusted at that date. As soon as the numerous details incidental to the completion of a contract of this magnitude are completed, we shall at once make payment of every unpaid loss, irrespective of the dates upon which the same are due; it is our practice in all cases to pay our losses in cash, without waiting the usual sixty days allowed by the policy, and without discount, and now that we have assumed the liability of the 'Glasgow and London,' we propose applying thereto the same principles which we have for some years past adopted in connection with our own business."
