TRICKSTERS AT PAIRS.

A correspondent of the Country Gentleman. has the following timely dissertation on the

Wherever large numbers of people gather, a class of persons is usually found, who make a living by deceiving the public. They have schemes and tricks innumerable that appear to be simple and easy; but in reality they are quite difficult, but in some cases impossible successfully to perform; they have wheels and machines that are they have wheels and machines that are doctered to run as the proprietor may wish to make them. They have cocoanut head and negro dodgers to arouse the brutality in mion and boys. They have tented shows which as disgusting in coarseness and vulgarity. Among the throngs at agricultural fairs these leeches are out of place. They do not add to the attraction of the fair. They do not bring desirable patrons. They do not add to the attraction of the fair. They do not bring desirable patrons. They do not well the gate receipts. They are not patronized by intelligent patrons of the fair. They are not wanted by honest farmers. They are shuned with fear by "I do not want to hear," said Lesley, nutting out her hand blindly. Please do thoughtful parents. Because of their pre-sence, even the fair is not patronized by many of our best citizens' families. The complished by these fakirs would doubtless surprise us, were it possible to 'M gather and trace back to their door all the results of their work. They distract the not?' thought, they divert the attention, they destroy the interest in the real work of the fair. The competitive exhibitors, the meritorious displays, the awarding of prizes, are all robbed of the undivided interest that elongs to them, and which the managers have labored day and night to develop. The ieve, from actions and words that, without warning, are sprung upon inquisitive audiences in the tent shows.

Lesley made no answer.

'You speak strangely,' said Kenyon, with some slight coldness beginning to manifest litself in his manner. Why should you not listen to me? If you are thinking of your father, I can assure you that he has no objection to me. I have consulted him already, the would be honestly glad, I. orals of the country suffer seriously, I belalready. He would be honestly glad, I believe, if you would care for me-he has cold me so. Does his opinion go for nothing She shook her head

'I can't explain.' she said brokenly. 'I can only ask you not to say anything-least I have promised—' 'Promised not to listen to me?'

'To anything of the kind,' said Lesley, ling that she was making a terrible mes of the whole affair, and yet unable to un cosen her tongue sufficiently to explain.
'May I ask to whom you gave this

There was another silence, but this tim it was a silence charged with ominous sig-nificance. Maurice's face was very white,
