opportunities were more frequent and they accepted the occasions by utilization of all the demonstration humanity may make with hands, feet and throat. The minority also had their vengence when victory came in the eleventh. After cheering themselves hourse crowds rushed on the field and patted the victors with admiration.

The game might be truthfully characterized as a grand contest. It was not a pitches's battle, but a battle where every one of the 18 players took prominent part. The Boses' fielding was almost perfect, their only error in the 11 innings being a missed ground ball early in the game by Short Stop Thomson. Even on this the play might have been called a hit, and the fielder exempted from a black mark. The Alerts made seven mishaps and four were responsible for three of four runs scored by their opponents.

All of the failures were on easy chances, for the Reds seemed to have the faculty for executing difficult plays with ease and accuracy. The losens also outbatted their opponents.
