A Broken Wedding Ring

By Bertha M. Clay

"Not one," she replied. "I shall know when I meet my ideal; my heart shall speak and tell me. I have not met him yet."

"When you do, my dear, I prophesy—Well, I will not prophesy; I will only tell you that a grand passion brings more pain than pleasure, and that if you want to be happy you must avoid the terrible fever that men call love."

Chapter XV.

The Duke and Duchess of Roedene had become very much attached to Leah, and when the season ended they begged the general and her to come to pay them a long visit at Dene Abbey. They were to remain there during the autumn and winter. Sir Arthur did not quite like the idea, and a compromise was made. The whole party were to visit Brentwood first, and remain there for six weeks; then they were to go to Dene Abbey and stay there as long as Sir Arthur wished—an arrangement which pleased every one. Leah by this time had grown to love the duchess so much that she never liked to be separated from her for long together.

Brentwood was looking its best at the end of July. The lovely month was as fair as it could be—not too warm, but with all the glory of sunlight, the song of birds, the bloom of flowers, the beauty of spreading trees and singing brooks. There are few counties in England so charming as Warwickshire. Shady woods, green hills, clear, deep streams, meadows on which the great white water-lilies sleep valleys full of ferns and wild flowers, render it a beautiful county; and Brentwood was one of the most beautiful places in it. The mansion was built on rising ground overlooking the river Brent—a deep, clear stream, full of lights and shadows, that meandered through the fairest woodland and seemed to sing as it wandered, of the scenes it had left behind it. Of arches formed by the green willow trees beside it, of dark, cold, shadowy nooks of laughing hillside which glowed in the sun, of green fields, of white swans that sailed down it, of reeds and sedges through which the wind made music, of pretty rustic bridges that spanned it, of lovers that whispered sweet words on its banks—of all these the river seemed to murmur.

The grounds of the mansion extended to the very bank of the river. There was a picturesque old boat-house haunted, rumor said, by the spirit of a jealous, unhappy lady who had drowned herself in the stream, and whose dead body had drifted into the cool, silent shadows of the boat-house, where it was found one day.

The Brent woods were as beautiful as a dream—a fair, green kingdom, inhabited by the most musical of birds, by shy rabbits, by saucy squirrels, by a thousand living things known only to ardent students of Nature. There were avenues like great cathedral aisles, full of gleaming lights, half-green, half gold; lovely shady "clearings," where the flowers grew so that they formed a carpet—butter-cups and daisies, meadow-sweet and columbine, wild hyacinths and blue-bells, flowers enough to send a poet or artist into raptures. Hidden in the woods, too, were numerous little brooks, tributaries of the river Brent.

As the mansion stood on the slope of a great green hill, its appearance was very striking. From the back-ground there seemed to arise a forest of green; on either side stretched smiling woodlands, and in front the beautiful terraces and grounds sloped down to the brimming river.

The general had invited several guests to Brentwood, and the party promised to be a very pleasant one.

"At some future day you will be sole mistress of this beautiful place, Leah," said the duchess, as they were walking one morning on the great terrace.

"I suppose so," she replied; "but I never like to think of the time. I wish that my uncle could live as long as, if not longer than, I shall."

She seemed anxious not to continue the conversation, for soon afterward she clasped her hands in delight. "O, duchess!" she said, "what quantities of my favorite passion-flowers! And what colors—purple, scarlet, and blue! What rich clusters! I must gather some; they are like the faces of old friends smiling at me."

"You have brought passion-flowers into fashion," the duchess said smiling; "I never saw you without them. Why do you like them better than any other flower, Leah?"

"I do not know. I think it is because they are mystical flowers; they are full of mystery and passion and sorrow."

"You ought to like red roses, best," said the duchess, "they suit you."

"No," returned Leah; "give me scarlet passion-flowers; they seem to me choicest of all."

"I suppose," laughed the duchess, "that when the ideal 'he' comes it will be discovered that his favorite flower is the passion-flower?"

"I should not be surprised," replied Leah.

"That will be one of the signs of which you will know him," said the duchess, mockingly; but afterward the words came back to her, and she marvelled at them.

What the duchess had said was true—Leah had brought the passion-flower into fashion. It was her favorite. If in a fashionable crowd one saw the gleam of scarlet passion-flowers, it was certain that beautiful Leah Hatton was there. This fancy of hers was well-
