

CHRIST'S DYING PAINS AND WORDS

Come, reader, come and see the dying scene of Christ, and how he agonized...

To hold, immovable, with changed hands, In silent sorrow too profound for speech...

To wipe the blood that round His temples flows, To moist His lips, His dying eyes to close...

Will they that Mother in her grief exclaim, (Her heart a furnace of intensest flame)...

How great His mercy to the humble thief, Who felt compunction for his sin and grief...

How great His mercy to the humble thief, Who felt compunction for his sin and grief...

How great His mercy to the humble thief, Who felt compunction for his sin and grief...

obliged to consent, though with reluctant reluctance; and, having paid his ransom...

In a short time the shores of the Northern coast were fast receding from them.

'Good-bye, Ireland!' said MacNevin, as the tall bluff of the Giant's Causeway...

pointing to the name over the hatch. 'Besides, if it were an attack by pirates it is not here but on deck the dead would be found.'

'What shall we do? The vessel is driving forward towards the rocks dangerously fast,' said Ronald.

'We must explore a little more, and see what it all comes to. A few minutes will suffice.'

'Eugene! Ronald! I have been here! Francois, in a second after from one of the sleeping berths leading off the cabin, to which he had gained entrance.

'Entering where the call came from, they were some time before, in the darkness, they could plainly see around them. Then they noticed that two men lay bound securely, and tied in a sitting posture to the bunk.

'A gag was in the mouth of each, and as they lay back, their shoulders against the partition, they appeared to be dead.'

'They are not dead—their life in them still,' said Eugene, in reply to a whisper from Francois, as he felt their pulses.

'There is a light someone, and my cabin there. And one also one see if there is any stimulant in the cabin. Their lives may depend upon instant attention.'

'Francois was fortunate enough to find a light, and the water in the bottle in obtaining stimulants either for the place was but little disturbed. Whatever was the origin or cause of the quarrel it seemed clear that ordinary robbery or plunder had nothing to do with it.'

'In a moment the cords that bound the two insensible forms were cut, and carefully a few drops of brandy were poured between their teeth. List by list the quantity was increased until the action of the pulse gave Eugene token of a movement towards strength and recovery.'

'Francois,' whispered Eugene, 'have you ever seen that face before?' 'Let me see. Hold the light a little nearer. Let it fall over his face. Why, Eugene, it is—'

'Our old captain!' 'The very same. I could get for a moment remember. Your recognition confirms my own impression.'

'I thought he was on board the British fleet?' 'What could have brought him here? Heaven alone knows.'

'If he recovers we shall soon know. Meaning, Francois, you shall leave you to take care of them. The ship needs mending, too, and it will take us all our time to fix the helm and stuff the sails. Thank Heaven, the storm is abating a little.'

'It is fortunate that two men so skillful as Eugene and Ronald had come on board, for the vessel had got into the race of waters that with swift current heretofore done little harm. North Channel on the iron rocks of Rathlin. What with the treacherous current, added to the storm of the night, and the heavy gale still blowing from the South, she was being with blind speed towards the perilous rocks.'

'An hour, or even half an hour would place her where human aid would be unavailing. 'The time is no time to be lost here, Ronald,' said Eugene, as they reached the deck and took in the surroundings.

'None,' said the other emphatically. 'I shall be able to wear her round.'

'We must try. Some of the sails are still good. Unless we can—and immediately—we shall never get on French or Irish soil again. We are among the breakers.'

'We must wear her round. We cannot abandon her.' 'You could not even if you would. No small boat would last a minute in this boiling surge.'

'Very well, Ronald. Help me to tie this helm; the villains have let it very loose. Such the mainmast whilst I run aloft and clew up the top yards. You had better stand at the helm, MacNevin, and see that it does not shift. Keep a hard a port. We may weather the terrible danger yet. But it will need all our efforts.'

'Whist! Ronald braced up the main-sail that had been fluttering about with every movement of the ship. Eugene mounted swiftly aloft, and spreading out some sails, and making them taut, clew and fastened up others.'

'It was wonderfully quick action, but the hands at work were gifted with the skill of a first-rate sailor, and precisely as a horse, galloping loose with trailing reins, finding himself caught and with a hard hand in command, goes steadily forward in a fixed direction, so the space of a few minutes under the guidance of the two active hands at work, the ship ceased her tossing and tumbling, and plunged steadily forward over the waves, and the danger was over.'

'The danger was still imminent! Before the vessel's head could be brought round, what with the engulfing whirlpool and the driving wind, she was forced to make a curve that brought her perilously near to the iron rocks over which they could see the surf beating on their sharp, striking contrast with their black and jagged peaks. Eugene remained aloft to make the necessary changes of sail, occasionally motioning his directions to Ronald, who stood lower down; and the helmsman looking at the white faces and active forms of both ready to let go or clew up as the instant demanded, could see by their nervous movements that the danger was imminent and deadly.'

'After a time the ship curved round her head to the open sea, and leaving the black rocks to her left—so near that the rush of the surf over them came distinctly on their ears—headed like a parting steed forward. There was no tossing in the trough of the waves now, as with sails taut to the hatches of sheer-stroke, she rode buoyantly over them.'

'Once aloft, Eugene and MacNevin, leaving Ronald at the helm, proceeded downwards to witness the captain's fate. The stimulant had produced its effect, and the latter was now only insensibly recovered to be able to recognize Francois, but to speak. The pointing between himself and'

Eugene was most cordial. 'Of all the pieces in the world the last I should expect to see you in! and the last of all circumstances, how did it come about? I am impatient to hear it,' asked the latter.

'It is easily enough told,' said the captain when his strength had sufficiently recovered. 'The Thunderer when refitted was sent to cruise off the coast of Canada. I deserted at Quebec and came to Boston. There I met some Irishmen whom I knew years before—men who loved their old land, and were ready to make sacrifices for her. They raised funds—'

'They were all of high position and opulence—to purchase this vessel, and to load her with firearms and ammunition for the cause of Ireland.'

'Yes, the hull is stored from keel to underdeck with them at present. What she carried something as good or better—large funds for the support of the Irish cause—for the army in the field.'

'The captain paused, partly with emotion and partly with regret. 'But what has happened—what makes this terrible scene outside?' asked Eugene, impatient for an explanation.

'The gold was too much temptation for some of our crew. We shipped at Boston—for we found it difficult to get hands—part of the crew of an English slaver which had been seized there.'

'And they attempted to rob you?' 'They did—more than attempted. They succeeded. Deceiving the rest of the crew into the cabin with a false cry of fire, they fell upon them unexpectedly with cutlasses and pistol shots until they overpowered them.'

'That explains the sight outside?' 'That explains it,' said the captain. 'And they bore off the gold?' 'I wonder that they did not kill you also.'

'I intended worse; they left us to die, to bear all the agonies of knowing that the vessel was driving to destruction without power to alter her course, and to die a living death, as we have been during the past eight or forty hours.'

'Where did this take place?' 'At the entrance to the Channel. 'And you have been beating up the Channel in this manner all the time.'

'We have been pitching and tossing—driving hither and thither—in all the fury of last night's storm. It seemed to me before I grew unconscious, as if the spirits of all that ever were drowned at sea were whistling and shrieking in the rigging and on deck.'

'It was the wind tearing through the ropes and sails.' 'Perhaps it was; but the sounds were not like that. I should know the shrieking of the wind after twenty years at sea, but the cries and wails that were around us all night were not like that. Where are we now?' 'North of Antrim—off the North coast of Ireland.'

'We would have been driven with great speed.' 'The gale of last night was not likely to let a ship rest on the waters,' said Eugene.

'It is true. Singular how we steered clear of the shore on either side, to reach this far safely. Which puts me in mind to ask what brings you here—what good luck brought you on board?'

'The extraordinary chances of war. But I shall tell you again. We have other more pressing matters now on hand.'

'The word—how goes the insurrection in Ireland?' 'Over—over for our lifetime. Crushed out—drowned out in blood.'

'And Tone?' 'You could not even if you would. No small boat would last a minute in this boiling surge.'

'And the rest?' 'Dead—or in prison. Some in the gibbet, some in the jail. Don't ask me further about them. It is necessary to me before I grow unconscious, as if the spirits of all that ever were drowned at sea were whistling and shrieking in the rigging and on deck.'
