We say "somewhat," for this failwell be exaggerated. regrettable, for it seems to have been over technicalities and unessential regrettable, for it seems to have been over technicalities and unessential issues; but it has not derogated in the least from the patriotism of the disputants and their unity in the face of the enemy. They know England and the English yeav, little who ever that it. the English very little who say that it has. Yet it may have deplorable results. The Coalition Government, never too strong has more as well as the coalition of the property suits. The Coalition Government, never too strong, has met a rebuff which it may not survive. Mr. Asquith's words to the House, "I do not know who will be responsible for the conduct of the business at next session," have almost the sound of a valedictory. There are more unlikely things than his resignation, and it would be idle to pretend that a successor could not be found. But the nation can ill afford to lose this great man now. For more than sentimental reasons he should still be at the helm when Britain at length emerges viccounted for more Germans during this when Britain at length emerges vic-torious, with her Allies, from the or-is accepted as inevitable when the military one is over. The incisive criticism in America and other neutral countries, and in Britain itself, of the spirit and some of the terms of the Paris resolutions has had a good offset. The matter is not now in so effect. The matter is not now in so great danger of resolving itself into a selfish battle between Free Trade and Protection. We are not likely to see an economic "reprisal" against Ger answered. An English regiment failed to take the first line of trenches. many and the adoption against her of her own methods of penetration and the like, which in the end would only band neutral nations with her against us. England has learnt much concerning trade and commerce from the war and from Germany; she has learnt above all the value of organization, as Bonar Law puts it. We have every confidence in the future. Great Britain organizing and prepar-ing her wealth and resources for the resumption of trade and the re-estabcontinuance in peace of the close and friendly relations with her allies and colonies that the war has brought about, is almost as inspiring a sight as Great Britain diverting them to the mighty purposes of this titanic combat.

For two years Britain has been preparing for war while she has waged it. Now—there can be no doubt about it—she is preparing for peace. Her statesmen are discussing openly and in detail post-bellum conditions and the measures that should now be taken to adapt the nation to them; it is clear that they see victory and peace in sight. The Prime Minister has reiterated the fundamental conditions, unaltered since the beginning, on which peace must be built, the restoration of Belgium and Serbia and of the devastated portions of France and Poland. His own remarks and those of other ministers are beginning to put in a clearer light Britain's attitude towards the economic "war" that is accepted as inevitable when the military one is over. My dearly beloved Brethren: These words of the Old Testament taken from the Book of Machabees form one of the scriptural foundations on which rests an important and dis-tinctive point of Catholic doctrine, that doctrine which teaches us the efficacy and the value of prayers for the souls of our departed dead. The fate of the human soul, the noblest part of man's nature, when it has been set free from the trammels of the flesh, has always been a subject of interested speculation for the human mind. Even those who repudiate all idea of the supernatural, who doubt or deny the existence of a Supreme Being, who refuse to accept the doc-trines of a final resurrection and re-ward and punishment in the world to come, believe in some state of exist-ence after death. Few there are so ing of man's immortal spirit to another world, where account must be rendered to a Supreme Being for the actions of this life. She lays down in Her doctrine of the Communion of Saints that a very real relationship exists between the living and the dead, that a very real, though mystic bond of union unites together those who are still struggling in the flesh, those who have passed to the Great Beyond and We were asked to go which we did are being purged from their imper-fections and unworthiness and those own hands laid their sons on the altar and put the enemy to rout but we lost fections and unworthiness and those who have entered their exceeding great reward. It is one of our most cherished beliefs that there is, in the daily ministrations of the Church, a constant interchange of kindly offices between the living and the dead, that the Blessed in Heaven assist their struggling brethren in this world, and that both the Ellect and the Church forth none can exceed the horses. heavily in the charge.

Now den't fret about me as I am all right. With love to all. Good-McMurdo's Store News that both the Elect and the Church militant assist by their prayers and of those who have made cherfully and nobly the greatest of all human earth but are not yet worthy to be admitted to the vision of God.

This consoling belief it is which gives meaning and significance and gives meaning and significance and soul to the solemn requiem service at which we are assembled to-day. We are gathered here this morning for the discharge of a sad and sacred duty—a two-fold duty, one towards the living, the other towards the living, the other towards the Altars of our Church to give reverent expression to our remembrance of our Altars of our Church to give reverent expression to our remembrance of our heroic dead, to sanctify that remembrance by the influence of religion, to hallow that remembrance with the hope and the solace that faith alone can afford. The Church recognizes her obligations alike towards those who have given their lives so generously in their country's cause, and those whose lives have been darkened and saddened by the death of their friends and loved ones. This two-fold obligation the Church discharges by following her departed dead into the next world with Her prayers and sacrifices, and by tendering from the depths of Her motherly heart Her sympathy and condolence with those
