Sailing of the Ark of the Soviet.

Not since the sailing of Henry Ford's Peace ship has there been such an embarkation of pilgrims as those who took their compulsory departure for an unstated Baltic port on the U. S. transport Buford. Whoever christened the Buford "The Ark of the Soviet," he is a wit of the first water. The party which sailed away on the morning of Dec. 21st, was not as merry as one as that which departed on Mr. Ford's private ark to get the boys out of the trenches before a now vanished Christmas, but it probably contained as many human curiosities. A good many Americans must think the war was almost worth while since the departure of Emma Goldman comes as a climax, and it is further comfort to them that her gentleman friend, Alexander Berkman, accompanies her. For thirty years this pair have devoted their energies to raising Cain, the patron saint of anarchists, in the land of their adoption. The United States gave them liberty, and plenty to keep body and soul together. One of the chief pleasures of their existence, -- newspaper, publicity, -- has been accorded to them in full measure. Altogether they enjoyed an existence under the Stars and Stripes, until the United States entered the war, as happy as any professional anarchist could desire, -- a life free from poverty, with capitalists and existing institutions, -- something entirely different from the lot that would have been theirs had they remained in Russia. Emma Goldman had even the pleasure of helping to stage, in company with William Randolph Hearst, at least one high class assassination, that of President McKinley. Under the influence of her teaching other public men have been shot at, and sometimes winged. The number of attempted assassinations through bombs shipped through the mails by her disciples has been large. Yet with all the little enjoyments which America afforded Emma Goldman and her friends, she was never satisfied. She and her like never revealed any indication that America was worth living in until they were called upon to leave its soil. We should have thought that in providing these anarchists with a free passage to Russia the United States had put the finishing touch on thirty years of generosity. Emma Goldman and her friends have gone about representing Petrograd under the regime of Lenine and Trotsky as the New Jerusalem, a paradise on earth. Now, when the door of opportunity opens to them, to live under Bolshevik idealism they are angry as wildcats. It is certainly hard to satisfy an anarchist. We wonder also whether Trotsky will be really glad to see his friend Emma once more. -- Toronto Saturday night.

Oldest Living Language.

"Viri trahite jugum" ("men drag the yoke") sighed the Roman politicians when Nero turned down the request of the Amalgamated Toga Makers' Union for an eight-hour day and raised taxes to pay for the autumn series of orgies and a new fiddle.
"Vyrai, traukite jungan," echoes the Lithuanian of the present day as he and his fellow-refugees shoulder their packs and set out for the return trip to the farms whence they were driven by the Germans before Lithuania had set up its present republican form of self-government.
The striking similarity between the modern Lithuanian and the ancient Latin languages is no mere coincident applying to those few words only (says the "Bulletin of the Lithuanian National Council.") Lithuanian is the oldest living language in the world to-day. It resembles most the primitive Sanskrit and is probably older than Greek or Latin, with which philologists find it has much in common. It is entirely different from German and Slavic tongues.
Professor A. Meillet of the College of France says: "If you wish to hear from the human lips some echo of what the language originally common to the Indo-European may have been, go and listen to Lithuanian peasants talking."
Emanuel Kant, the German philosopher, wrote 119 years ago: "Lithuania, having a loyal character, deserves the protection of the state. She must be preserved, for her tongue possesses the key which opens all the enigmas, not only of philology, but of history."
