There were three days of debate on the compulsion bill in prospect when the measure, which has entered upon the committee stage, was taken up today, and there were signs of a temporary slackening in interest in it. Many amendments, mostly of a hostile character, emanating from the faction led by Sir John Simon, the former home secretary, had been placed in the order paper, but none except those proposed by the governance of the second total in the field. Sir Robert did not consider that Canada should shrink from raising an army of 500,000. Parliament must remember, he declared, amid loud was part of the British Empire.
