He wished to point out some of the discrepancies that found place in the minds of the government members. The fact was there was a considerable deficit on July 1st, 1893. At first the finance minister said there would be a surplus of $500,000 on July 1st, 1893, and yesterday he said the surplus would be only $705,000. The contention was that the government could not meet the appropriations and pay the special and trust funds unless there was another loan or the taxes were increased. The premier continually referred to his (Mr. Beaven's) private af-

Mr. Cotton said if the leader of the government knew how to lead the house he would have no cause to complain about the way the debate was conducted. He was sure the premier knew very little about the conversion of the debt. The government had not succeeded in controverting the statement that it would cost $600,000 to convert the loans of 1877 and 1887. When the government asked legislature to sanction the loan of 1891 they acknowledged that it would cost over $400,000 to convert the loans, but it was shown by the public accounts that it would cost more than that. The finance minister had said the trust funds could be used as the banks used deposits. How would it be if a bank used its deposits to pay the salary of the manager and clerks? The province had no right to act as a bank. The remarks of the member for the Islands showed how a man's political morality could be duned by being connected with the present government. That gentleman had argued that it would be better to send one innocent man to jail than to let two or three rascals go free. He had said that although the government had done wrong they should be retained. The premier boasted that the monopolists supported the government.
