with a man she afterward found was already married. When the wounded woman for whom she has substituted herself appears in the third act, Zira begs her not to insist in diagnosing her before those who have learned to love her, for whom she would die. Met by stern politeness, and after pathetic pleading Zira finally turns on the woman whose place she has usurped, in a whirlwind of desperation, and dashes her to tell her story—a dramatic climax scene as seldom seen on the stage and in the following scene of Zira's abject remorse for what she has done, the interest is sustained to the close.
