A Window Sash Device.

A novelty in electrical appliances is window-sash operating device. It consist of a switch having two keys, one of which operates the upper sash, while the other controls the lower part of the window. By turning the key to right the sashes are raised, and they are lowered by a movement in the opposite direction. The device is adaptable to any window, but little preparation being needed and the re modeling of the frame being unnecessary. In one particular respect it is a great con venience—on the approach of a storm of the windows of the house can be instanti closed without a visit to each window bein entailed. This is not only a good feats in its use for schools, halls, public and office buildings, but it makes the invention specially applicable to churches, as the minister can have his pulpit provided with a switch board, and whenever he finds the atmosphere of the church too oppressive he can let in a supply of fresh air from one or a dozen windows. If need be, however, the church can be made self regulating a simple device can be placed in circuit with the window mechanism which will automatically open or close the upper sash according to the temperature of the build-
