The Secret Out.

"Even her white hair. Why, sir," the doctor proceeded, after a moment's pause, "have you thought what she went through in a few hours? Her disappointment in Milesworth, the revelation of feeling that must have caused her return, her meeting with Mildred, dressed and ready to take her part in the great drama they were playing, the shock and realization which must have come at the sight of what her change of intention would mean to the poor girl with whom she had just become intimate, changed every token of affection; then the hurried rush to get back into her own clothes which likewise meant her own identity, followed by that final act of Mildred which in one moment made the room a charnel-house and threw across her triumph and the festivities of the hour, a pall of mortal fear and horror, which was all the more terrible that she must hide it from every eye, even from that of her bridegroom. And then that shriek, telling of some unknown terror and discovery. Either Mildred had come to life, and was in anguish to find herself locked in the room with her memories and the smell of death upon her; or the key that Genevieve held in her bosom had not turned the lock, and in a moment, perhaps, she would hear a shriek and this time that of Murder! Was there no time that of the strongest man, much less that of a weakened and already greatly troubled woman? And when by her hurried action she had forestalled his possible speech, and by her woman's wit succeeded in hiding herself with him in that room of death alone, can you not imagine the shame and horror which must have overcome her as she found herself forced to show him the ghastly results of her trick and plot with him for aid where she hoped to triumph over him in her disdain. If this and all of this was not enough to whiten her hair in a night, I can imagine no train of thought that would. My own hair almost turns at the thought of it, and I am a hard and world-worn man."

"You are her worthy advocate," affirmed the inspector, "and I am almost convinced by your arguments. I should like to ask you one question, however, which may strike you as impertinent and unfeeling, but which I assure you is prompted by no desire to offend more than the desire to do you a service."

"Ask it; I know of nothing which I should dare withhold from you in this matter."

"It presupposes that you know me to be acquainted with the letters you have just shown Mr. Gryce, and it is in regard to the sentiment with which you now suppose your wife to regard you. Is it love, you say?"

"Not gratitude simply, nor regard; but love."

"Love?"

"Yes, it is but a short time since she was pouring out the most extravagant expressions of affection for another. Excuse me; I cannot stop to soften these hard truths."

"I know; but a passion so wild and unrestrained has terrible revulsions. She needed just such an experience, perhaps, to show her what true love is."

"And you have missed nothing?—nothing in her regard for you I mean?"

A smile appeared on the doctor's pale lips for an instant. "If I had not trouble but that I should be a very happy man."

The inspector, grave beyond his wont, eyed the doctor keenly.

"You are not deceiving yourself?" he asked significantly.

"No."

"Pretty women can often make a man believe anything."

The doctor rose. Anger flashed from his eye and sounded in the tone of his voice.

"You insult a most miserable man," he began, but meeting the inspector's eye, he stopped, quivered and sat down. "I see that this is only another wrench of the rack," he exclaimed. "You have a purpose other than that of destroying me."

"I want to find out if Genevieve Greyton was of so light a nature she could turn from one love to another in the twinkling of an eye."

Dr. Cameron surveyed the speaker, realized what danger might lie in his reply, and was silent.

"I cannot believe," the inspector inexorably pursued, "that a woman who could feel and express herself as Genevieve Greyton has done in these letters we have read, could from any momentary revulsion of feeling, give her whole self to you with that freshness and ardor four languid seems to imply."

"And still the doctor was silent."

"If time had elapsed, after a season of indifference and mental depression she had shown, first appreciation of your goodness and then a gradual awakening love for the man who cherished her so fondly, I could have understood her conduct. But to leap from one ardent passion into another without pause or transition seems so unnatural that I should not blame you if you felt some doubt as to the truth."

"But—" the doctor began in protest, though he got no further. He felt himself in a net and he did not know which way to turn.

The inspector noted him keenly and proceeded with seeming heartlessness. "Would not that have been your opinion if it were another man's case than your own that you were considering?"

"Possibly; I cannot say—I seem to have lost the power of thinking; you awake a nest of sleeping serpents in my breast and ask me to stand off and analyze their writhings. Is it necessary to make me suffer so?"

"It is necessary. That you suffer fixes an important fact in my mind. Had you not suffered—had you been able to contradict me—I should possibly have drawn different conclusions. You will forgive me when you receive the clue to my motives."

"But am I not to know them now? Am I to be kept waiting in this suspense?"

"Dr. Cameron, I will not keep you in suspense. Though in consideration of Mrs. Cameron's condition I shall refrain for the present time from placing her under actual arrest, I am so confident that she knows more than she ever told us concerning this poor girl's death that I must beg of you to consider her as under surveillance. You will find when you return home, a woman in your parlors whom I request you to place at your wife's side in the capacity of nurse, though her business directly is that of a detective. She is a kindly, capable and discreet woman who will neither offend you nor betray us. I rely upon you to receive her and put nothing in the way of fulfilling her duties properly."

"Ah, sir," came from Dr. Cameron in a burst of shame and agony, "can I do otherwise? Are you not the master of my fate and honor?"

The inspector who found this as hard a piece of work as he ever had had to do in his life, shook his head. "I go no further than my duty compels me," said he. "You have been made the victim of a woman wholly unworthy of you and have my sympathy, as you will have that of every other honest man in the community."

But the doctor did not care for sympathy; it was justice he wanted. "And there is no escape," he cried. "Must we submit to this indignity, though you do not even know there was any murder committed?"

"There is a mysterious death to account for and Mrs. Cameron is the only one who can account for it. To be sure if we knew all that Dr. Milesworth could tell—"

"That he shall tell. I will appeal to him and he will answer with the truth."

The inspector gazed at the other, compassionately. "You might not want to hear it," he suggested.

But the doctor flashed out quickly and earnestly.

"I do. These doubts, this uncertainty will ruin me. If you think he knows the facts which surround Mildred Farley's death, confront me with him. He will not long retain his secret when he sees what his silence will cost me."

But the inspector was not so easily gulped. "Dr. Milesworth is a very strong man, and having made up his mind to suppress the truth in this matter, it will not be so easy to force him into speech."

"He does not know that my wife has confessed to the death of this girl in her room."

"And do you propose to tell him?"

"If you will countenance me in so doing."

"And you think that will be sufficient to loosen his tongue?"

"Yes, sir."

"I do not agree with you. Men of his stamp have peculiar ideas of honor. If he was willing to perjure himself to save your wife from consequences that he feared, he will need something more than this indirect acknowledgment from her to make him change the story predetermined between them."

"Not with the arguments I shall add to it. If he is a strong man, I am a desperate one and I will wring the truth from him if he be made of iron."

A LIFE SAVED.—Mr. James Bryson Cameron, states: "I was confined to my bed with inflammation of the lungs, and was given up by physicians. A neighbor advised me to try Dr. Thomas' Electric Oil, stating that his wife had used it for a throat trouble with the best results. Acting on this advice, I procured the medicine, and less than a half-bottle cured me; I certainly believe it saved my life. It was with reluctance that I consented to a trial, as I was reduced to such a state that I doubted the power of any remedy to do me any good."

LARRY LAWLESS' SUICIDE.

One of the Bullets Passed Through the Heart.

What Transpired at the Coroner's Inquest—Deceased D-sponding—The Verdict.

The circumstances surrounding the tragic death of Lawrence Lawless, the postoffice clerk who fired seven bullets into his left breast on Friday night last, were ventilated before Coroner Dr. Flock and a jury last night. The inquest was held at the police station at 7:30 o'clock, and lasted about two hours, but in that time an unusually large amount of evidence was taken. From the very first, however, everything pointed to suicide, and the jury judging by their remarks, were very weary. In fact one member wanted to stop before half the witnesses were examined, but things were not going that way, and the proceedings went on.

The story of the suicide, as published in Saturday's "Advertiser," was fully corroborated by John R. Gosling, proprietor of the house where Lawless boarded; John E. Rose, who assisted in forcing open the door of the deceased's room; Sgt. Robt. Crawford, and P. C. Thomas Howie, who were called by Mr. Gosling, and Misses Etta and Sarah McIntyre, two servants in the house, the former having just entered her room across the hall from Lawless' when the firing began. It was she who raised the alarm, after partial recovery from nervous prostration.

R. J. C. Dawson, postmaster at the city postoffice, spoke of Lawless as a class clerk, whose attendance to his duties had been very good. Mr. Dawson had seen him very frequently, and never considered him unfit for duty. Lawless was appointed in 1873, and had been once suspended for delinquency, registered letters. That was many years ago.

Mr. Arthur Carothers, a fellow-clerk of Lawless', was a pretty intimate friend of Larry's and frequent visitor to his insurance assessments. The money was always repaid. Mr. Carothers had heard that Lawless was in financial difficulties, and that his wages were to be garnished. That was the end of it. Deceased had a United Workmen policy for $2,000, payable to his wife.

The only evidence to show that poor Lawrence was in the least despondent, was given by Mr. Addison Raymond, stamp vendor at the office. The rest of the witnesses had always found him very quiet, yet agreeable. Raymond had found him the same, even the afternoon of his death. A. Raymond, however, said that, howsoever, Lawless was reciting his troubles, better dead than in such difficulties. "I made an impression on me," said Raymond, "as he had talked rather strangely before, and I was not in the least surprised when I heard he had taken his own life."

The result of the post-mortem was given by Dr. Waugh. The body was well nourished and developed, and all the organs were in a healthy condition, except the kidneys and liver. Six of the seven bullets had entered the body, and one had become lodged in the chest wall. The lowest ball entered the spleen, two passed through the stomach, another went through the lung, another took the same course and injured the heart, while the highest passed through the lung and heart. The bullet, the doctor was satisfied, had produced death. Dr. Waugh was satisfied from the direction of the bullets, that Lawless had worked the revolver with his left hand.

Coroner Flock, before leaving the matter to the jury, called attention to the many stories which had gone about the Lawless' domestic troubles. Derogatory remarks had been made about his (Lawless') mother-in-law, Mrs. Barrett, of Dundas street, London West. The coroner had learned, however, that she had acted a very good part, and had proven herself a lady. During Larry's financial troubles she had mortgaged her house for $450 and advanced it to him, and that mortgage, with the exception of $50, was still standing against the property. Both Mrs. Barrett and her daughter were ladies in every sense of the word, and were in no way to blame for the rash act.

The jury unanimously agreed, and without leaving the room returned a verdict that the wounds were inflicted by Lawless with suicidal intent.
