

that they are inclined to adopt), and the mode, after a time, ceases to be an object of remark.

The dress of the men is various but is not so much an object of curiosity; it may be summed up as consisting of a cloth cap, woolen or cotton shirt, vest, coat, pants and moccasins, which are worn as a whole or in part. Owing to the occupation of the individual, some partake more or less of the dress of the untutored savage himself.
