certain amount of morbidness to enjoy playing the martyr, and Louise was naturally cheerful and healthy in mind.

But she was entering a period which is trying even to women who have been thru it before. Motherhood, with its many problems, was something that terrified her. She felt perfectly helpless before it. She wished with a sort of desperation that she could go to her mother with the questions that were in her mind. Before she was married she had this wish for someone to talk to, for someone who would explain in a sympathetic way the facts that are shrouded in mystery and silence or misrepresented in an evil flash of gossip.

If she had wished then that Mrs. Driscom was different, her desire for "Yes." Louise answered, but her thin voice still sharper in tone.

Driscom was different, her desire for a mother's counsel and comradeship was infinitely greater now. And finally she decided to go in town and see her. Her mother's unhappy married life might have accounted for her lack of sympathy with Louise's marriage, but certainly Mrs. Driscom had not had any bitter experience in motherhood. And she hated to spend the long Saturday afternoon alone. Indeed, she felt she might, after all, run up to the Shaftsbury tea and find Harry and tell him she was sorry she had been so temperamental that morning.

But her idea of attending the tea ended with her mother's remark when, after they had finished a late luncheon, they sat in the big library by the fire.

"Mes Woldertal low, would be glad to have a grandchild. I came to tell you about it and ask you about it. It's marvelous to me, but I want to know so many things first. You were horrid about our marriage, but I thought this at least would please you."

"You poor, wild, romantic children."

Mrs. Driscom sighed. "You've neither of you sense enough to look after yourselves, and now you are going to undertake the responsibility of amother soul as well. Do you think it's fair to Harry, to burden him with a he can carry now? Do you think it's fair to yourself, tired as you are? "My dear," began Mrs. Driscom, in the tone she unconsciously used when she was about to say something particularly unpleasant, "I wish you would get another suit. That's obviously a last spring model! Skirts are now shorter and wider, and no one is wearing that style of coat at all." something new, when he has more than he can carry now? Do you think it's fair to yourself, tired as you are? Above all, do you think it's fair to the child, to bring it into the world when there's so little now you can do for it?"

She spoke sharply and feverishly, leaning towards her daughter. And her illusions gone, all her lovely tendered.

The foregoing is the voiced opinion of one man but it is the silent thought of a million right in this province.
