CHAPTER XX.
A Cardinal Sin.
ALLAN was down in Westchester, not, however, at Redhill. Ever since his return from America he had been thinking and thinking how to commence the journey to commence how to make a career for himself. Only one way seemed clearly open to him, that was Parliament. Hitherto, he had been content to wait for a few years, or until the seat held by his father was again vacant, it being understood that member who succeeded Mr. Boucher would not again present himself for election. Allan believed he would be invited to occupy the seat as soon as the opportunity came.
Recently his views had changed; he was now eager to get into the House for any borough, however small, which would accept him. He had plenty of confidence in himself, and determined to devote himself to politics until he held such a position that he could be invited to renounce her father's name, in order to aid him in grave and more ambitious aims. Urged on by love and ambition, Allan felt sanguine as to his eventual success.
He had made his father acquainted with his wishes, and found him willing to do all in his power to gratify them. As soon as a suitable chance should occur Mr. Boucher promised that he would furnish the sinecure of a seat for Allan, and would do all for a borough which, as a preliminary step, would accept him as the candidate of the party he favored.
There being a rumor in the West that the chief party member at Hurd had had his member's resignation in his pocket, ready to produce at a convenient opportunity, Allan, at the request of some of the opposition whippers, had gone down to the little town of Hurd, being only about thirty-five miles from Redhill, on a more or less regular stage, and as neither of the parties was in an overwhelming majority, it was felt that a candidate whose family was so influential in the county would be the very person to reverse the decision given by the constituency at the last election. So Allan was made welcome, and stayed three or four days, seeing influential people and generally preparing his way for the struggle which might any day commence.
He had heard that his father was far from well, so determined, after his business at Hurd was over, to go across to Redhill and spend the day there. He wrote to his wife to this effect, saying he should not return till the latter end of the week. Then, he felt compelled to be in town, as Miss Francesca appeared on the opening night of the operatic season in one of her most celebrated characters.
He had other business also which called him back to town, and it was partly this business which took him to Redhill. When Josephine came to his home in the dead of night with the red and raw arms, he had always said that she should be freed once and forever from the villain who had so treated her. It was with great difficulty he had been kept from visiting Digby the next day and administering a satisfactory thrashing. Josephine and Frances at last persuaded him to leave the matter to the law to settle. He had therefore consulted his solicitor, but he had given him no definite instructions. Without seeing his father, he scarcely liked to take such a responsibility upon himself. Mr. Boucher, although he was now greatly broken in health, had always been accustomed to lay down the law to Allan; and that law had always been wise, salutary, as well as a kind one. A few days could make no difference, so nothing had been done as yet.
Frances, for some reason, was not sorry that her husband did not intend to return immediately. She was much exercised in endeavoring to form a true opinion about George Manders, and she only attributed to it the one end, in a way, the right case—the visit paid by her husband. She was long for Allan to return. She could not quite decide whether to tell him of Frances' expressive welcome to Digby, or whether to let Frances inform him at her own pleasure. Still she wished that Allan was home.
She dared not stir out of the house for fear of meeting Digby. She could not get for a moment believe that he had come solely to see Frances. In her agitation she had almost the look of surprise on his face—a genuine look; and knew he had come for her; had most likely followed her and Mrs. Melville home. She almost wished she had not taken those papers, feeling sure that she would not make the efforts she knew he was making to gain an interview with her for her own sake. However, so one should see them or know of their existence until she had placed them in her father's hands. She would not even admit to exist.
It was the morning after the ominous visit that Allan's letter, saying he should not return for a couple of days, arrived. Josephine, who could not help noting every look, every word of Frances, fancied she perceived little sorrow or annoyance at his prolonged absence. She blamed herself for thinking that the absence of recent meetings was due to her own fault, and she telegraphed and told him her return at once. Fortunately, her good sense told her that such an unwarrantable act of interference would be justly resented by Frances, and most likely by Allan as well.
Josephine did not see much of her sister-in-law on the day when Allan's letter arrived. Miss Francesca was fully occupied. It was Thursday, and on Saturday her re-appearance in opera was announced. She was, of course, rather anxious as to whether the public would continue to be pleased with her efforts, and with her usual conscientiousness spared no labor to secure favorable verdicts. There was little fear as to the result; all who were competent to judge, and by rehearsal privileged to judge, asserted that her voice was stronger and more commanding than ever. Still, with all the many things she had to think about, the promised communication from George Manders was seldom out of her mind. As late as Thursday night she had heard nothing from him.

Perhaps the reason was that he had been very busy since he had left her. He saw clearly that a crisis in his affairs was at hand. He had regained possession of his papers, and would have gone straight to Redhill, wrung what he could out of Mr. Boucher, and vanished with his ill-gotten spoil, leaving everything arranged (as he had it could without his interference. Now his first and foremost task was to insure Frances' silence. This must be done any way, even by any crime. Let him only keep Frances quiet for a month—even a fortnight—then he would have time to decide things. He might even tell Mr. Boucher, if necessary, that Josephine held the certificates—this would be equivalent to placing them in his hands. But as soon as Allan learned he was George Manders, the man his wife had been looking for high and low, the game, as far as a golden stake was concerned, was up. He wished now he had not spared Allan—that he had revealed all to him. Judging him by his own standard, he believed hushy would have been forthcoming. Yes, he had been too clever.
However, if hard work could repair mistakes, he was doing his best that way on the Thursday. He was up at an unusually early hour and down at the little place some twenty miles out of London. He spent several hours in the quiet cottage, and although he was quite alone, and two or three blisters on his hand told that he had been working hard at some manual labor, he appeared entirely satisfied with the result of his unwearying exertions and unusual exertions. He looked up the uninhabited house and in the afternoon went back to town.
He had just time to see his stock-broker, who by his directions had that day closed all his ventures. The last money he had extorted from Mr. Boucher was coming rapidly to an end. A few hundred pounds only remained. Days were slipping by, and the forged bill had not been taken up. His affairs were indeed getting a crisis!
In the evening he went back to his hotel, the Langham, and telling the cashier he should wait his bill in the morning, sent a waiter for a Continental Breakfast. He professed himself intensely stupid with respect to the mysteries of time-tables, and made inquiries of two or three officials at the hotel as to the best and quickest way of getting to Nice. Could one book a sleeping carriage from Paris? Would it be better to telegraph to have one—two places kept for him? His questions gave every one who heard them the idea that he started with a friend to-morrow morning with the intention of getting to Nice as soon as possible. He felt instructive that any letters should be forwarded to Digby Boucherier, Poste Restante, Nice; and in the morning, having paid his bill, told the porter to call on him to Charing Cross. He told the cabman to drive to Charing Cross, and stop at the corner.
"Get a boy or someone to take a letter," he said.
A messenger was found, and was instructed to take a letter to No. 1, and wait for an answer. The letter was addressed to Mrs. Allan Boucherier, and was duly delivered at the right house; but the answer was so long in coming that the writer of the letter had to pay both messenger and cabman for the time they had wasted for it.
But it came at last, and its purport satisfactory, as the occupant of the cab laughed, paid the messenger handsomely, and then told the driver to go to Charing Cross as fast as the horse could travel.
Knowing instinctively a customer who would not haggle about a fare, the hansom was sped along at a rate which almost defeated its impeller's eads, rendering him liable to being stopped for violent driving. Either it went too quickly, or the guardians of the street were not quite enough to stop its headlong career, as the occupant was able to catch the eleven o'clock train, not, as may be supposed, to Nice, but to B—, the little village, or town I believe it is called, which was a convenient distance of London. So quickly did the cab over the distance, that Digby Boucherier, or George Manders, whichever name we choose to call him by, had ample time to leave his luggage at the cloak-room and go to B—perforce unaccompanied.
The answer he had waited for at the corner of Charing Cross was a very laconic one. It consisted of three words; but the words were—"I will come."
Brief as the reply was, it gave the writer a great deal of trouble to pen it. The letter which demanded the answer had reached her at breakfast-time. As a rule a prison does not get an early rise, but Miss Francesca liked breakfast at a decent hour, and her exertions of the previous night rendered late rising an absolute necessity. She, Mrs. Melville and Josephine were lingering over their breakfasts when the note arrived. They were toying with a dish of early-ripened strawberries, which some noble friend had sent as a welcome offering to the celebrated singer. The tips of all the ladies' fingers were pink with the juice of the delicious fruit, which they ate in the most sensible manner, taking the berry by the stalk, dipping the apex of the berry in sugar, and then putting it into its legitimate receptacle. Frances read the letter, and looking very grave, replaced it in the envelope, which lay face upward beside her plate. It was a mechanical way she went on eating her strawberries.
