Barbara Moore, president of CUPE 3912, said that part-time professors at Dalhousie will be locked out if there is a strike, but they will continue to be paid.

"We still have to talk to them about that. We still have to make arrangements," Moore said.

Teaching assistants will continue to hold office hours and mark any papers received during the strike, but students are under no obligation to hand papers in to them, or attend tutorials during the strike.

Earle says that the union supports the DFA and has stated that it hopes Dal administration will see the importance of its position.

"We are supportive of their demands, particularly their call for an end to the elimination of full-time positions at the university. This is eroding the standard of education at the university. We would call on our members to show solidarity with the full-time union on their picket lines, and in any discussions with students."
