Allum ex mænibus hosticis Ma...ona bellantis tyranni Prospiciens ... Suspire, chev. ne rudis agmini m Sponsus laccesat regius asperum Tactu leonem."

This may be paraphrased, [When the wife of the oppressive 'yzant-I do not know whether Mr. Fawcett is married looks out at him the miner-from the windows of the hostile office, she will sigh and tremble, lest her husband, the man of toyalties—regins!—though absolutely inexperienced, provoce the lien of terrible to rouse—i.e., the British, Canadian and American public.] ean public.]

Horace goes on to describe what he considers to be the three chief virtues of a public man:

1. "Dulce et degorum est pro patria mori?" Major Walsh has risked his life for his country, and it is for that reason that he is specially admired. Every child in the ald country knows the story of his entering Sitting bull's camp unarmed, and thereby he has attained a place in the affections of his countrymen, not among the great strategists, such as Roberts; but among the dauniless leaders, such as Gordon
