The Assassination of Count Tisza.

Amsterdam, Nov. 4.—The Berlin Vossische Zeitung contains a dramatic description of the assassination of Count Tisza, former premier of Hungary, last week.

At six o'clock in the evening three soldiers invaded Count Tisza's residence and presented themselves into the drawing room. Count Tisza, with his wife and the Countess Almásy, advanced to meet the intruders, asking what they wanted.

"What have you in your hands?" a soldier demanded of Tisza. Tisza replied that he held a revolver. The soldier told him to put it away, but Tisza replied: "I shall not, because you have not laid aside your rifles."

The soldiers then requested the women to leave the room, but they declined to do so. A soldier then addressed Tisza as follows: "You are responsible for the destruction of millions of soldiers because you caused the war."

Then raising their rifles the soldiers shouted: "The hour of reckoning has come."

The soldiers fired three shots as Tisza fell. His last words were: "I am dying. It had to be."

The soldiers quitted the house, accompanied by gendarmes, who previously were employed to guard the door.

Why Germans Fear an Invasion.

(From the New York Times.)

Why is it that the Germans manifest such a wild fear that their country will be invaded? That is, of course, a purely rhetorical question—a question the answer to which everybody knows—but one can in the usual fashion pretend inability to understand, without taking careful thought, the cause of the panic reported to be prevailing in Germany. Invasion is dreaded and hated everywhere, indeed, but in these days invasion by the armies of any nation except Germany or her late allies would not put civilians in much apprehension as to either their lives or their property, and women and children would consider themselves fairly safe even from insult. The expectations of the Germans are different from those of other people because the Germans are different from other people—and because they do not know it and cannot believe it. They know what invasion meant when they were the invaders, and to think of it as meaning anything else for themselves when invaded is for them impossible. Hence their wild rush out of the Rhineland. But how hard it will be for them to select a direction in which to run that will not take them, after not many miles have been passed, among a people whom they have cruelly abused and ruthlessly exploited under the plea of "military necessity!"

Where Armies Sail to Battle.

The rivers and canals and other waterways of France have served to good stand in Allied hands, especially of late when the entire front has been ablaze with many battles which are to determine the future of the world. Indeed, these waterways, which might at first be considered military obstacles, are proving invaluable in the transportation of men, food, material, horses, guns and so on to the fighting line.

Like their other Allies, the French and Belgians, the British have made full use of the waterways in their sectors. Thousands of troops are moved up to the battlefront in huge canal boats drawn by special motor boats. In the same manner the horses and guns and huge stocks of supplies are constantly transported on boats where waterways are available, thus relieving the already heavily-taxed railways.—Scientific American.

Coin Collectors.

There is hardly a country in the world the coins of which are not, at some time or another, handed over the counters of the Y.M.C.A. in France. The recognized legal tender is current English or French money, but, quite regardless of that, coins come rattling into the tins from Belgium, Italy, Portugal, Switzerland, Greece, Australia, Canada and the United States, and even from Spain, Luxembourg, Roumania, India, Argentina, Tunis, Indo-China, and Mexico. Papal coins of Pius IX. have been noted, and on one occasion a halfpenny of William and Mary, dated 1694. Probably the rarest numismatic treasure, besides the English seventeenth century coin, was the franc piece of Napoleon I., which bore the compound legend "Republique—Napoleon Empereur."
