

The Braes of Yarrow

An Historical Tale of the Sixteenth Century.

The Captain remained silent, and with an expression of mingled suspicion and surprise, whilst Gilbert read—

For the hands of Master Gilbert Elliot, greeting. These from a friend.

I am in some trouble on your account, and much concern for your safety. But I know you are true and brave, therefore I bid you be of good heart; for though the Regent cannot be brought to favour your cause, there will come a time when the wrong that has been done you will be righted.

In the meanwhile, the same reason which has refused you your commission imperils your life. I know this, and pray you to seek safety in hastening from the city—away from the land. Heed this and obey. Beware of Binram, of all villains on the earth, for he seeks you with treacherous intent.

For myself, I am forbidden to wait upon my mistress till she send me further command. Therefore I too must seek safety in flight, and am resolved to escape to my good sister, the lady of Glamis. If I can but reach her, I think her protection will suffice to shield me from the wrath of one who is, I fear, hastening his own overthrow from a bright too great for his happiness or safety.

"MAY DOUGLASS."

The excitement Gilbert experienced at this new token of the esteem of one whose esteem he had begun to value more than that of all the world beside, compelled him to read the epistle a third time before he had grasped the full import of its words.

Then, without pausing to explain anything—for he feared that an explanation would result in counsel in direct opposition to the course his impulse dictated and which he was bent upon following—asked for inkhorn, paper, and quill. Lindsay pointed to where these articles stood on the cabinet, and Gilbert hastily wrote:

"Sweetest mistress,

"Under your favour always, if Binram seek me we shall soon meet, for I seek him. But I will delay the meeting if it be your pleasure to command my service as your guard to the home of the lady of Glamis in the north. Should this be your will, you shall find me at the porch of St. Catharines to-night when the bell for vespers begins to ring. I will wear a black cloak and a plumbeous bonnet. You shall say—winter has come; and I shall make answer—the bird flies. Then we shall know each other, and I will conduct you to where a couple of horses will be in waiting.

By to-morrow at noon, with heaven's will, you shall be safe with Lady Glamis. I dare not speak the gratitude I feel, the debt is too heavy now for me ever to requite it; and it grows heavier, yet more pleasing to bear every day.

"GILBERT ELLIOT."

"In duty humble service and life, yours."

When he had carefully folded and sealed this, he delivered it to the page, who concealed it under his doublet, and with another profound reverence to both gentlemen, departed in the same mysterious manner as he had entered.

There goes the proper carrier of silly billets, the proper go-between in amorous intrigues, which have made more pretty men bite the dust than ever there were true women enough to replace. Page-craft has indeed lost its lustre and become a plague.

This course was a growl from Lindsay, some part in sad earnest, for it was at this period that the duties of the page changed from those of the training for knightly service to those of a mere servant and ornamental attendant.

"I knew that you would blame me for what I have done," said Gilbert frankly, "and therefore, I told you nothing till my resolve was beyond the aid of counsel."

A STRAY ITEM.—There has been a paragraph, which appears to be growing interesting, floating about in the papers for a considerable time past, and nobody appears to know whence it came. The item has reference to the decrease of the population of Blanshard township. Its history is briefly this:—The report of some of the officials (the Assessor, we presume) appeared a long time ago in the Stratford Beacon—for Blanshard is in the County of Perth—at considerable length, and we condensed it into about two lines, which contained nothing more than a statement of the number of people in the township in 1861 and the number in 1867.

In this form, this little piece of news "went the rounds," its vagaries being not a little amusing. Sometimes it would disappear for weeks, then show itself again like some palpable will-o'-the-wisp, and thus it flitted about until it found itself in the hands of the editors of the Montreal Witness. With pious zeal they located Blanshard in the Province of Quebec, peopled it with French Canadians, and poured the vials of their indignation on the "tythe system," which so impoverished those on whom the Romish hierarchy had claims, that they were forced to emigrate. Our sage contemporary on Wyndham-st., no doubt caught sight of it from the Witness, for a day or two after it appeared in that paper, he set up a most doleful howl, bewailing the depopulation of Canada, citing Blanshard, in Lower Canada, in support of his argument, and averring that the whole Dominion was going to the dogs, or further. A very small matter sometimes creates a very great commotion, but this is the simple history of the paragraph concerning the appalling exodus.
