The Peach Woman---and Others.

BY CHARLOTTE C. ROWETT.

There are as many kinds of women as there are peaches and such he fruit belt. In the fruit belt.

There are the apple-woman; good and true and square, kind and mellow-natured, with the seed of a great future ripening in her heart. She is ready for the everyday uses of life, ready for breakfast, for dinner and supper, and good as can be, and wholesome, and impossible, almost, to spoil with any kind of cooking in life's cauldron.

As a variant of type there may be mentioned the crab-apple woman, who is all pink sweetness in the blossom period, sours badly later on, and becomes, at last, the most equisite conserve, flavored up with the rose gerantum leaf of experience.

geranium leaf of experience

THE STRAWBERRY GIRL.

THE STRAWBERRY GIRL.

There is the strawberry girl, too, with scarlet lips and cheeks stained deep with the juice of life; with soft tendrils of bronze-red hair straying over a white forehead, and a laugh that sounds like a chime of spring bluebells when the fairles ring them out on a wedding day.

She may not at first sight appear as useful for every day as the applewoman, but you never can tell. After she has gone through the scalding, simmering, bolling process that nature has prepared for her, maybe she will be just the richest kid of strawberry preserve.

Then there is the peach girl. There isn't any need to tell you what she is like, because every boy who ever cast eye of love on some sweet girl has noted the curving, downy, soft cheek of her, and her sweetness and her bloom, and has said to his own heart in a deep whisper, "My, isn't ehe a peach!" The peach girl lasts well, too, let me tell you. Her sweetness survives the brushing off of the first bloom, and she brings to the lips the curve of joy to the last bit of her life, and leaves a bitter sweet seed to tuck away and get more loveliness from the growing of it.

THE APRICOT SISTER.

There is the apricot sister, delicate, soft of texture, seemingly only fit to be guarded from all the roughness of the world, and yet of so penetrating a flavor that with all who come in contact with her she leaves a nuance of herself.

And then there is the grape woman; mature, rounded in life and character, flavored by all the suns of her long summer time, yet with the bloom of morning on her checks and the beaming light of early days in eyes of older wisdom. She has lived, has this woman, vears have tested her and tried, but have not too much troubled her; she has borne what like must come to all, and got from each some added depth of nature, some orighness of the sun behind the cloud, some coolness of the cloud that lims the sun.

Be sure that this woman is the mother of many. Though she has never borne a child, yet children turn to her and she quiets them and gentles them; and she inspires the youth who comes her way with some nobler aspiration and some better hope.

This woman of the vineyards is the sum of the sunmer full of slumbrous days, of the spring when tendrils were sending forth from their almost invisible blossoms an aroma that one who has not walked among the clustering vines in that delicious scason dreams not of; of the winter of preparation, and the rich autumn of fruition.

They may talk about a rose-bud garden of girls—als a garden, I grant you. But it is a garden of tree and vine, strong, well-nurtured and bearing the fruitage of the coming years.

RECIPE FOR CURLY HAIR

So many readers have written for the ourly hair recipe that our beauty expert, Miss Cynthia Grey, is literally swamped with mail. So here's the secret:

with mail. So here's the secret:

Write to any druggist in any town in Mexico for some Mexican root. Just address "Druggist." They all carry it. It is not a proprietary article. The price is $1 16 a pound Be sure to say it is for a hair shampoo; otherwise they might send you a Mexican soap bark.

To prepare the shaoipoo: Crush the root with a hammer; put two handfuls of it in a dish; pour ever two and a half quarts of boiling water, but do not cook it. Let it stand thus 15 minutes, then strain. Use the clear liquid as a shauipoo; then rinse the hair slightly with hot water.

Use the shampoo every nine or ten days. If it smarts, use less of the root, it should not be used if the scalp is covered with eruptions. It is said to be harmless and users say that long continued use will make the hair early.
